Mr. BOOHER. That does not answer the question. Now, suppose some Government comes to this country through its agents and buys goods that are not contraband of war and puts them on an American vessel. Will we then insure the foreign owner for his goods shipped in the American vessel?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I presume we will under proper conditions, and I suppose this bureau will exercise discretion and that the rules to be promulgated under this law will be such as to safeguard us against any complications that may involve us in any possible way with foreign nations.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman think this Government ought to insure the goods that are purchased by one of these belligerent nations? Would not that involve us at once with the others who had no interest in these goods?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Possibly that is true, and should we do so we would have the loss to pay, but I am not going to assume our Government will do any such thing.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman says it can be done under this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It may be broad enough to do it, but I assume that the regulations which will be made to carry out the terms of this bill will not include anything that is contraband of war.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if there are not now private companies who are willing to take this war-risk insurance?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know of any.

Mr. TOWNER. Is the emergency that we are asked to meet because there are no private insurance companies that would take war risks, or is it merely for the purpose of making smaller and cheaper rates than are now offered by private companies?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I presume the purpose is dual. First, the private companies will not issue policies covering war risks entirely; are not willing or able to carry the entire risk. The policies which will be issued by the Government will not cover the ordinary marine risks at all. They will be essentially war risks.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand that, but I have this kind of a communication, and perhaps other gentlemen have received it from people interested in shipping interests in New York who say that the rates asked for war-risk insurance are prohibitive, and urge us to vote for this bill in order to obtain cheaper rates. That is as I understand the situation as derived from information of that sort. Now, if that is the case, what we are asked to do is merely to subsidize these ships that are to engage in this business, is it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I would not call it a subsidy, but I would say the Government is called upon to carry this risk and maybe at a less rate than the companies are willing or able to do it.

Mr. TOWNER. And that amounts to a subsidy, does it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a discrimination in favor of our shipping. In other words, an effort to help our trade in an emergency to move our commerce under the extraordinary conditions now existing.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The gentleman from Missouri and myself have had occasion to talk of these matters relating to the subject of the bill once in a while, and I would like to ask him whether the passage of this bill in his judgment will increase the number of ships engaged in seagoing trade? And before he answers that I want to call his attention to the fact that a bill that I introduced has been referred to the committee of which he is the chairman, and calls for the purchase on the part of the Federal Government of the North German Lloyd and the Hamburg-American Lines, and if this bill fails to do what is intended does he not think that the bill I introduced should be reported from his committee?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say no. I am not in favor of reporting from my committee any bill to the effect that the Government will buy the ships of the Hamburg-American Line or of any other corporation, association, or person. That would be a very unwise thing to do.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The gentleman, of course, is only expressing his individual opinion in regard to this matter, and I assume from what he says the matter has not come up for consideration in the committee as yet, there being matters that require their attention elsewhere.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly I am speaking for myself and not for the committee, as we have not considered the gentleman's bill. We have a bill pending before the committee, however, to authorize the Government to buy ships. But I hardly think that we would report a bill to this House to buy ships of any corporation, naming it. It would be very unwise in my opinion. I certainly would not favor it.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. That is the point I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to. There lie in the city of Brooklyn to-day half a dozen of the finest steamships that float, and if the Government contemplates the purchase of any lines I hope that the gentleman's attention will be directed to this fact, so that the Government may obtain the best that is available.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the gentleman will consume more time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman that if the Yankee loads his goods, as no doubt he will load them, expecting great profit from them, and if the ship reaches the other side, he will receive it. If the ship is lost, the Government will pay him his loss. Am I right?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; if the policy issued by the Government covers the risk.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, does not this, in his judgment, very, very greatly increase our risk of peace?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hardly think so, if this law is judiciously enforced. In the first place, there will be a war risk on the vessel. The vessel will be under our flag and entitled to the protection accorded by international law to a neutral. There may be an additional war risk assumed on the cargo, but contraband of war, I take it, will be excepted from that risk. So that if a neutral ship, a ship under our flag, should go into a foreign port having on board contraband of war, the contraband of war would be excepted from the risk and subject to seizure, and the foreign Government might levy upon and take possession of the contraband goods. That would be the concern of the consignee of the cargo.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not going to take the gentleman's time, but I want him to answer another question. There is a question now as to whether goods are contraband or not. Is it not likely that we might get into dispute with some foreign nation as to the character of goods we are hauling—as to whether they are contraband or not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is possible, of course, and might result in pecuniary loss to us. We must remember this, that it is not the expectation of our exporters that all our exports will go to Europe. One of the greatest demands for the extension of our shipping is to South America. That, to my mind, is the inviting field, and we can extend our trade in that direction without much risk. Heretofore our exports to South America have been carried by foreign ships, mostly ships of Germany and Great Britain. Those ships have been withdrawn from the trade on account of the great danger of capture and confiscation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Let me finish this statement. Now, I want to bring ships under the American flag and have them owned by American citizens to engage in the South American trade and elsewhere as required. They will be our ships, neutral ships, but if necessary we will issue war-risk insurance on the ships and cargoes that may go to South America or the Orient. My view is that the war risk in that direction will be very small. There will be very small risk of capture or confiscation of any part of the cargo unless it should be shown that the cargo is being shipped to South America to be transshipped to Europe and is contraband. We must not overlook that fact.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The thing I wish the gentleman would explain is the risk that is involved if it is not proposed to cover contraband of war. Where does the risk come in? What is the risk of running these vessels if that is counted out?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Suppose one of the belligerents on the high seas should sink one of these ships, whether with or without reason? Suppose they would confiscate the cargo without reference to whether it was contraband of war or not? The policy would cover just that class of risk. But if the cargo is in a neutral ship—and ours would be neutral ships—and bound to some foreign port, European or South American, ordinarily it would not be disturbed, but it is to cover those contingencies. Conditions in war times are abnormal, and must be met in some way.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman, then, is assuming that these belligerents will recognize the neutrality of our own ships and leave them alone. Can we safely rely upon that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not in every instance; no.

Mr. BUTLER. They did not recognize the neutrality of Belgium.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will yield a moment, I wish to say that it is a well-known fact that floating mines are being placed, or have been placed, in the North Sea. I think that would be a war risk, and if one of our vessels sought to navigate the North Sea, to enter a port there, and ran into one of these floating mines it seems to me that would be a war risk to be covered by insurance.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to know if it is intended by the Government to insure vessels that go into danger zones? For instance, are we going to insure one of our vessels that goes into the North Sea after notice has been served upon us that it is dangerous? If so, I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman's question is a matter of discretion with the insurance company, which in this case would be this board. They would have the power. I simply wanted to point out that instance, where there would be a war risk without any belligerent appearing.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of course, the gentleman does not anticipate that happening.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Norway and Sweden and Italy and Denmark and the Netherlands are not belligerents now, neither are Switzerland or Greece, and there are others I might mention; yet, at the same time, there is more or less risk growing out of the existence of war in Europe, and trade with those nations is subject to other than the ordinary marine hazards, and our American exporters hesitate to send their cargoes under our flag to those countries, even in our own ships, unless this risk is cared for either by private insurance companies or by the Government, and we are given to understand they are willing to pay the premiums if the Government will assume the risks incident to war.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied as much time as I care to. I do not wish to trespass upon the time of others who may wish to speak. The Chairman, Mr. ADAMSON, has been very kind to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not the principal danger the fact that the ships will be suspected of carrying some contraband in a mixed cargo, and they will be towed into the ports of a belligerent and held there during the war, or for two or three years afterwards, at insurance rates?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know. But one can think of a thousand ills that may befall an American ship and its cargo. An emergency confronts us. Will we meet the emergency, although it involves some risk, and be equal to the occasion? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to include in my remarks the regulations of the British Government governing war-risk insurance, to which I have referred. As I understand the method that will be followed, the marine insurance companies will insure the vessels and cargoes, including the war risk, and the Government will reinsure the war risk, or a certain percentage of it, and receive the premium.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including the regulations named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The details of the British Government's marine war-insurance plan, taken from the Shipping World of August 12, 1914:

BRITISH WAR INSURANCE—DETAILS OF THE SCHEME.

The subcommittee recommend (a) in the case of hulls:

(1) That arrangements should be made with the existing clubs or mutual war-risks associations that they shall extend their existing standard forms of policy to cover the King's enemy risks up to the arrival of the vessels at the final port on the voyage which they are making when war breaks out or hostilities have begun, and for 10 clear days after such arrival.

(2) That arrangements should be made with the existing clubs or mutual war-risks associations for the issue of policies covering the King's enemy risk on vessels starting on voyages after this country is at war.

(3) That the State shall reinsure 80 per cent of all these risks.

(4) That no premium shall be charged by the State in respect of voyages current at the outbreak of war.

(5) That for voyages begun after the outbreak of war the State shall fix the insurance premium to be charged on a voyage basis, and shall receive 80 per cent of such premium.

(6) That the State shall have the right to fix and vary the premiums from time to time, as may be considered necessary, within a suggested maximum of 5 per cent and a minimum of 1 per cent; but a rate agreed for a specific voyage shall hold good if the vessel sails on that voyage within 14 days of the completion of the insurance. On the other hand, if the starting of a voyage is delayed under the orders of the admiralty, the assured shall have the option of canceling the policy and receiving back the premium paid.

(7) That the clubs shall run the remaining 20 per cent of these risks, both before and after the outbreak of war, receiving for voyages commencing after the outbreak of war 20 per cent of the premium fixed by the State.

(8) That all expenses shall be borne by the clubs.

(9) That the club policy shall contain the following warranties:

(a) That no ship insured by the State shall start on a voyage if ordered by the Admiralty not to do so, and that under both the policy relating to a new voyage and the policy relating to the completion of the voyage any orders that the Admiralty may give to the routes, ports of call, stoppages, etc., shall be obeyed: Provided, That in case of breach the above warranty shall not operate if the assured can satisfy the committee of the club that such breach happened without the fault or privity of the assured and of the owners and of the managers of the ship.

(b) That the ship insured shall be deemed to be at all times fully insured against all perils covered by an ordinary Lloyd's policy (with collision clause attached) and containing an "F. C. and S." clause, and no claim whatever against which the ship is deemed to be otherwise insured as aforesaid or against which she is, in fact, insured by any other insurance policy, shall be recovered under the club policy.

(10) That ships so insured undertake, as far as possible, to carry out the orders of the State in regard to their routes, ports of call, and stoppages. Failure to carry out such orders will involve an appropriate penalty, but such failure shall not be treated as a breach of warranty.

(11) That each club and its constitution shall be approved by the State.

(12) That the State shall be represented on the committee of each club.

(13) That the basis of values for the purposes of State insurance shall be the value accepted for income-tax purposes; that is to say, the first cost of the vessel without allowance for the cost of alterations or additions, less depreciation at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, but without any minimum limit per ton.

(14) That the club shall not be bound to pay a loss if the ship be recaptured or released or restored to the assured within six months from the date of capture.

(15) That claim shall be dealt with and settled by the committee of the club. If a claim be settled with the approval of the State's representatives on the club committee, the State to pay on the agreed figures. If the State's representatives protest against a proposed settlement, the liability of the State under its policy of reinsurance to be settled (failing agreement to refer to arbitration) by the courts of law.

(16) That in the event of loss by destruction or capture the first payment by the State shall be made at the end of six months after the event.

(17) That the liability of the State shall be discharged in three equal installments at 6, 9, and 12 months from the date of loss or capture, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

(18) That a board of experts shall be appointed to advise the State on the question of rates and variations of premiums, and that the State shall have one or two representatives on this board.

(19) That this arrangement shall only extend to vessels which are in the clubs and which are under the British flag and registered in the British Isles.

(20) That the State should be prepared, if necessary, to make similar arrangements with other bodies than the existing clubs, provided such other bodies represent a sufficiently important amount of tonnage and can provide satisfactory machinery for the protection of the State in the matter of values and of claims.

92. (B) In the case of cargoes—

(1) That no arrangement shall be made for the insurance by the State of cargoes afloat at the time of the outbreak of a war in which we are a belligerent.

(2) That immediately after the outbreak of such a war a State insurance office shall be opened in London for the insurance by the State against King's enemy risks of cargo starting on a voyage after the outbreak of war.

(3) That the rate of premium charged by the State for covering these risks be a flat one, irrespective of the voyage or the character of the cargo insured.

(4) That the State shall have the right to fix and vary such rates of premiums, within a maximum of 5 per cent and a minimum of 1 per cent. But a rate agreed for a specific voyage shall hold good, provided the cargo starts on such voyage within 14 days. If, however, the voyage is delayed under the orders of the admiralty, the assured shall have the option of canceling the policy and receiving back the premium paid.

(5) That the values of cargo for State insurance shall be the values agreed in the marine-insurance policies covering the same cargo.

(6) That these marine-insurance policies must be produced at the State office, when the State insurance of war risks is finally arranged.

(7) That the premium for insurance must be paid in cash to the State office when the provisional insurance is effected.

(8) That if, when the marine-insurance policies are produced, the values in those policies shall be less than the amount provisionally insured in the State office, the premium on the excess value will be refunded, but no increased value on a shipment will then be accepted.

(9) That marine-insurance policies will only be accepted by the State if issued by members of Lloyds, British insurance companies, and other approved insurance companies and underwriters.

(10) That claims under the State insurance policy shall be settled on the basis of the marine-insurance policy, but such insurance policy shall be deemed to contain such standard clauses—if any—as may be approved by the State in regard to the particular class of cargo insured.

(11) That the State insurance of cargo shall be confined to cargo on vessels insured by the State.

(12) That the State shall be prepared to insure all cargo on such vessels, irrespective of the nationality of the owner of such cargo, except, of course, enemy cargo.

(13) That a board or boards of advisers shall be established to assist the Government both with the administrative work of the State office and with the settlement of claims.

(14) That one of these boards should be appointed at once with a permanent secretary.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in connection with the war-risk proposition, the risk of keeping our establishments running is also an essential one, and I want to announce to the House, so that the Members will know when they get requests for information on the subject, that the German Ambassador has assured me of his cooperation. I have a telegram from Rotterdam this morning to the effect that they are in communication with the Dutch plants on the Rhine, and they are going to keep the plants going, and we will get goods. That is all I want to say. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] use some of his time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair kindly notify me at the end of 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it is always an ungracious act even to criticize and much more to oppose a measure which is so generally commended by the public and especially by friends at home in whom one has confidence. This is also of much weight, that the measure was originally proposed by such an eminent committee of public-spirited citizens of the country whose judgment and advice is entitled to much consideration, but at the same time we can not evade our own responsibility, and it is our duty to analyze these important measures with care and frankly and truly state our conclusions upon them. The President and his administration well know that our criticism upon these emergency measures will not be captious or without foundation, and with that spirit I enter upon it.

When the matter came before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I am free to admit my general ignorance of the subject. The information which was given to us upon that hearing was scanty, insufficient, and unworthy to be the basis of such an important measure; so that I complained at that time about it and gave notice of my dissatisfaction. The debate in the Senate was equally scanty and insufficient. The report of the committee does not convey the needed information; does not do justice to the subject—a subject of such great importance as this.

As best I could, in the short time which has elapsed since this bill has been on the calendar, I have endeavored to ascertain what the facts are concerning this necessity so claimed and to analyze them as carefully as I could upon my own responsibility; and I shall try to present to the House this afternoon the results of my own judgment.

I know that you gentlemen of the majority will, or at least you ought to, accord to us on the minority side the acknowledgment that we have always supported the measures of the administration which we believed to be necessary, and which were shown to us to be necessary, by proper showing and competent authority, for the welfare of the country. [Applause.] And if sufficient information had been given to us as a basis for the desired action, I should have been very glad to cordially support this measure; but it is because, it seems to me, the information shows to the contrary, it is because an analysis of this legislation shows that it is unnecessary and may be productive of unfortunate consequences that I criticize it this afternoon.

CLASSES OF PROPONENTS.

Whenever a great emergency arises which requires important remedial action two classes of people always come to the front and urge matters of legislation or administration—one a selfish, greedy class, who cunningly propose measures ostensibly for the public welfare, but really for their own private advantage; another class of enthusiasts, men who have not considered or thought through the matter carefully, who are reckless of the consequences of the legislation or administration which they urge and who do not seem to care for its possible use as a basis for other and similar action in the future.

Now, I will not charge that those who propose this legislation belong in either class, but at the same time the House should realize the consequences, both temporary and permanent, of what we are requested to sanction. That can not be escaped or evaded and should be thoughtfully appreciated. And right here, as an illustration of what is going on and in answer to letters which I have received and which doubtless every Member on the floor receives, I wish to give an illustration of one or both of these two classes, although the illustration has nothing particularly to do with this subject. I hold in my hand a leter printed in large type denominated "The Bache Review," which was sent by a New York concern, J. S. Bache & Co., as it is stated, to 31,000 bankers throughout this country, urging these bankers to write to Members of Congress requesting that a concurrent resolution be passed, urging the Interstate Commerce Commission to revise the recent rate decision. I have replied to my constituents and friends practically as follows—and that is why I use it to-day as an illustration—that the gentlemen who make this request, urging Congress to interfere with the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, do not realize that the decision as to the great questions concerning transportation necessarily has been vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission; that that great commission has a tremendous influence and a tremendous power on that account, and that it has the confidence of the country, because it has so merited such confidence.

One reason why it has the confidence of the country is that so far it has been without any interference by either the executive or legislative branch of our Government. If on any pretext Congress once attempts to interfere with any of the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that will be the beginning of other interference, both by the executive and legislative departments, and interferences once commencing will bring the whole subject of the administration of the interstate-commerce law into partizan American politics. That will mark the beginning of the downfall of the system of regulation of the great transportation interests of this country. For that reason any attempt at this time from any source to interfere with the judgment or discretion on decisions should be very strongly condemned. Especially should any attempt to use this emergency as a pretext for attempting to extort more money from the pockets of the American people be severely condemned, when the commission after investigation and consideration, already too prolonged, has given its solemn judgment. These men indicate their willingness to subvert and even destroy our splendid system of public regulation for the sake of grabbing a few dollars right now.

Now, as I have stated, this is only an illustration of another of the measures which are being urged in this emergency, for things to be done which will result in the benefit of individuals or even large sections, regardless of the public welfare during the long future.

PROPOSALS OF THIS LEGISLATION.

What is it proposed to do by means of this legislation? There are practically two things which are urged in the preamble and in the hearings before the committee and in the newspapers throughout the country: First, that it is necessary to move the crops of the country to a profitable market to have passed this sort of legislation; secondly, that it is necessary for the benefit of and establishment of the merchant marine of the United States to supplement the recent ship-registry bill to give this encouragement, so that vessels now under foreign flags may change their registry to the American flag, because of the benefits accorded by this bill.

It is important, then, to analyze these two situations to find out if this bill can really help either of these necessities. It is true that American crops were not leaving for Europe very rapidly a week or two ago, but the improvement has been very noticeable during the past few days. Three reasons have been given why the crops do not move at the present time: First, lack of cargo-carrying vessels; second, lack of marine insurance as to war risks upon vessels, cargoes, and so forth, under the American flag; and third, the unfortunate condition of foreign exchange and the breaking down of foreign exchange, so that payment can not be had for the sales made to foreign nations. My own judgment is that the latter reason is practically the sole reason why we are not shipping our grain crops abroad at the present time in such volume and under such circumstances as desirable. Of course, wholly a different reason exists as to shipments of cotton. There is now an utter breakdown of foreign exchange between Europe and the United States. There is no use trying to analyze it here, but Europe owes our bankers a large sum of money which it can not pay in gold. Our bankers and investors owe Europe a very large sum of money now due, aggregating probably $150,000,000, which we are not willing to pay in gold. Probably as large a sum will be due in the near future as interest and dividends on European investments in this country. Even more important, vast amounts of American securities would be at once sold if opportunity be offered and chances for payment afforded. There does not seem to be any arrangement for a working adjustment of these most important matters as formerly. The result is that credits are no longer used to make any movement of crops from this country to Europe or of merchandise from Europe here as formerly. Anything that is purchased here must be paid for in gold. Anything which is purchased in Europe, securities or merchandise, must be paid for in gold at this time, and that condition will continue until an adjustment of this question of foreign exchange and credits and balances and mutual confidence shall be reached. That more than any other one thing is breaking down the early movement of our grain crops and the stoppage of spinning our cotton.

But the crops have been moving during the last week or 10 days. During the last week large cargoes of grain and breadstuffs have been carried out of the southern ports, as well as out of the northern ports, and they have been paid for in gold. In the debate on this bill in the Senate the junior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. WEEKS, made the rather significant statement that at the time he was making that speech there were 130 ships in the Atlantic ports of this country which could be chartered. I have here a clipping which I found in one of the Washington papers dated August 20, which gives a list of nearly a dozen vessels that left for Europe the day before, or that had started for England since the war began, which were high in the water because of the lightness of their cargoes. Other ships tell the same story. I will insert several clippings in my remarks. It will be noticed that several of these ships are American liners, so there is no difference, apparently, as to cargoes whether the ship is under the American or English flag:

SHIPS TO ENGLAND GO LIGHTLY LADEN—BIG LINERS CARRY SOME FREIGHT, BUT TO ONLY PART OF CAPACITY—EXPORTERS FEAR FOR PAY—UNWILLING TO SEND PRODUCTS ABROAD UNTIL ASSURED DRAFTS WILL BE HONORED PROMPTLY.

NEW YORK, August 20.

Every ship that sails out of New York for English ports these days, sails light, though England is begging for food.

The liner Celtic left to-day with 5,000 tons of foodstuffs in her hold, when she might have carried 16,000 tons. The Kroonland left the other day with 4,500, with room for 8,000 more.

RIDE HIGH IN WATER.

The Adriatic, St. Paul, New York, Philadelphia, and others of the 13 ships of the International Mercantile Marine Co., which have departed for England since the war started, have ridden high in the water because of their lightness of cargo. Other lines tell the same story.

STORAGE HOUSES CHOKED.

Paradoxically, the storage warehouses in and around New York are choked with supplies for which England is offering fancy prices.

The reason why none of this food is going to England, officials of the trans-Atlantic lines assert, is because American shippers have no assurances that their drafts will be honored in England promptly and are unwilling to send their products abroad with nothing more tangible than a hope that they will receive prompt payment for their goods.

HELD FOR MORE FAVORABLE TIME.

Tons and tons of merchandise, these officials say, are held in check against the time when arrangements will be made to enable purchasers to pay promptly in gold for American supplies.

ENGLAND IS WELL SUPPLIED.

Although in need of foodstuffs generally, for the moment England is well supplied with grain, almost oversupplied, according to estimates made by officials of the International Mercantile Marine.

Mr. WEEKS. I will suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that floating mines are not necessarily capable of changing their location when they are planted. Mines are placed to defend certain waters, and they are anchored; but as a result of storms they frequently become detached from their anchors and then become floating mines and dangerous to general navigation. The setting adrift of mines indiscriminately, I think, has never been undertaken by any nation.

What I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas, however, is that I am confident everybody wants to do everything that is necessary to protect our interests in this emergency; and what this bill purposes to do seems to be following a course that has been adopted by belligerents on the other side, generally speaking. What I want to call to his attention is that at such a time as this we are apt to do things which are unnecessary. I assume that this bill is simply an anchor to windward, to be used in case of emergency, but not to be used in doing a general insurance business; and its value will depend on the quality of the men who are to put it into operation and their knowledge of insurance matters. Therefore, men with the very best technical knowledge on those subjects should be put in charge of this insurance bureau, with power to discriminate between the character of risks, as would be done by any other insurance company.

I am not confident that there is not ample shipping available to take all of our products to their market. A New York paper this morning states, for example, that there are 130 British ships in Atlantic ports waiting for cargoes; and somebody who wanted to send abroad a cargo of coal from Norfolk asked for bids, and 40 ships offered for that purpose. The Lloyds' risks are now lower on English ships carrying English cargoes than the risks offered by the English Government. They are down pretty nearly to normal, not over 2 to 3 per cent. I do not think we ought to go into the insurance business under those circumstances, but only when the risks become exorbitant, as they were 10 days ago.

NEW YORK, August 26.

The most spectacular development in the financial situation to-day was a jump of from 6 to 7 cents a bushel in the wheat market. Although probably due in part to the belief that recent German successes mean a prolonged war, this was chiefly the result of improvement in shipping and financial facilities.

SHIPPING SITUATION IMPROVES.

The spectacular rise in wheat, amounting to 7 cents in the September option, gave further indication of the improvement in the shipping situation and of the easier credit conditions now available for shippers.

Doubtless some of the urgent buying which has carried the grain market up so sharply during the past few days represents short covering and gambling for the long account by speculators, but the basis for the advance is the increased and increasing export demand for wheat and the improved facilities for shipping and financing shipment. Indeed, if the present export trouble involved nothing but wheat the situation would be practically normal. Unfortunately, it involves a great many other things, particularly cotton. The cotton situation continues to be a very serious one, both in its relation to foreign exchange and domestic banking. Nevertheless the improvement in the position of wheat, as evidenced by a sharp rise in that cereal, is a decidedly favorable and encouraging matter.

This hysteria is well illustrated by the clipping from Holland, one of the leading financial writers of the country, and its answer, from a clipping from the market column of August 21 and of the New York Herald of August 29:

NEW YORK, August 28.

Shipments of the country's foodstuffs to European ports were further facilitated to-day by the action of the eastern trunk railroads, which ordered a resumption of through bills of lading, subject to minor restrictions. It is expected this will have the effect of vastly increasing American exports and bringing about a gradual readjustment of the foreign exchange situation. But the British steamship lines which canceled charters at the old rates are not taking advantage of it. When they canceled, complaint was made to the British Corn Trade Association, which complained to their Government. All British lines are now taking grain at the old rates.

IMPORTERS FEEL EASIER.

The announcement of Ambassador Page from London that English steamship service had been ordered to resume has resulted in an easier feeling in importing circles.

Lines that have responded to this feeling included drugs, chemicals, olive, coconut and other oils, rubber, and pig tin.

The spice market also is easier under the belief that many cargoes now held up in the Far East will proceed to their destination in America.

WHAT THE COUNCIL PURPOSES.

If this council can persuade the Government at Washington to aid in restoring, as far as possible, over-seas commerce it will have accomplished something which none of the members could have dreamed of two weeks ago. How curiously chaotic are our commercial conditions is reflected in a statement made by President Farrell to the council. He told this board as soon as it met that the United States must, as soon as possible, start the movement of exports.

An extraordinary situation now confronts us, Mr. Farrell admitted. For instance, if it were possible to sell the steel company's commodities in foreign lands for $1,000 a ton, and if it were possible for the farmers to demand $10 a bushel for their wheat, nevertheless not a pound of steel or a bushel of wheat could be exported. Therefore no sales could be made.

COOPERATION WITH BANKERS.

This council is to act in cooperation with the bankers, and as far as possible with the Government at Washington, in securing means by which cotton, grain, and manufactured commodities may be safely committed to the ocean-carrying ships. It is not so much a question of immediate relief to manufacturers and to foreigners, but it is a question of supreme consequence to the United States at this time that these commodities find safe transport and be assured of prompt payment.

The council was the first organized body to set forth the fact that it is essential that the Government itself provide means for furnishing war-risk insurance whereby both the vessels and the cargoes occupied with foreign trade may be protected. This council will be substantially continuous in meeting until the day comes when the announcement is made that vessels carrying American cargoes are abundantly protected against depredation and are reasonably insured, and, when consignors of cargoes learn that, payments will be made to them promptly.

HOLLAND.

Answer:

GRAIN EXPORTS INCREASE RAPIDLY.

Indications that exports of grain are increasing rapidly and that the movement is in a fair way to become nearly normal in the near future deserved more attention than they received. The week's wheat exports, according to Bradstreet's figures, were twice those of the preceding week and quite as large as those of the corresponding week of last year. The sharp rise in the wheat market reflected this improvement in the situation, and the disclosure of the Treasury Department's plans to aid in financing the export movement added to the satisfaction which was expressed in conservative banking quarters.

Although wheat is now being exported in record-breaking volume, there was no relaxation in the sterling exchanges. On the contrary, rates were appreciably stiffer. In some quarters this was attributed to the war news, which was interpreted as indicating a protraction of the struggle. In other quarters the high rates were ascribed to competition of individual remitters, with a demand for remittance against the city of New York's maturing obligations abroad.

Bradstreet's estimates the efflux of wheat and flour from both coasts for the week ended yesterday at nearly nine and a half million bushels, while Washington dispatches quoted Treasury officials as estimating the exports for the week ending with to-day at 15,000,000 bushels. Such a movement must speedily create large foreign credits, particularly as imports are now falling off. Evidence of return to normal conditions is seen in the reduction of marine-insurance rates and in the notice given by the eastern trunk lines to connecting carriers of a resumption of through bills of lading from interior points to Europe on exports via the Atlantic seaboard.

Again, I will quote from Bradstreet's report for this week:

Bradstreet's will say: "Crop reports are more favorable, particularly as regards cotton, tobacco, and corn; wheat exports, spurred by foreign necessity, are of enormous volume, close to the record, indeed; necessary foodstuffs, such as flour, groceries, and allied lines, are in active demand."

Again, from Bradstreet's report of this morning:

Wheat (including flour) exports from the United States and Canada for the week ended August 27, as reported by telegraph to Bradstreet's Journal, aggregate 9,397,627 bushels, the second largest total ever reported, against 6,940,770 bushels last week and 7,042,180 bushels this week last year. For the eight weeks ended August 27 exports are 55,060,012 bushels, against 47,417,532 bushels in the corresponding period last year.

Again, from the New York Herald, on page 18:

It is also evident that the export demand has fallen off on account of the higher prices, and private cables from Liverpool said that both Roumania and Russia had decided to permit exports of breadstuffs, and this will be in competition with the American market.

The developments in Europe seem to point to a prolonged war, which will increase European requirements. Most of the recent purchases for export have been for quick shipment, and, aside from the wheat, a very large amount of flour has been taken.

From the morning edition of the Philadelphia Ledger, page 8, the market report:

American steamship Dominion is due to sail for Liverpool at 10 o'clock this morning. Although this vessel has few passengers, she is expected to carry a large general cargo, comprised chiefly of flour, grain, and oil.

Again:

Few steamships are being chartered in any trade. There is still a light demand for tonnage under a free offering of boats, with rates easier

Again, from Philadelphia Marine Notes:

Yesterday was the busiest day at this port since the beginning of the European war. When the exchange closed last night 27 vessels had arrived here or were bound up the Delaware for Philadelphia. Of this number 9 were barges, 9 schooners, and 9 steamships. Six of the steamships were under foreign flags. Most of the schooners and barges came from New England or eastern ports.

The fact is that during the last two weeks there have been abundant vessels ready to carry our cargoes of grain and breadstuffs and cotton. There is now no lack of vessel capacity at all, but, on the contrary, an abundant tonnage, at reasonable rates, caring for their own insurance, as the impartial testimony of these market reports clearly show. Lack of vessels and war-risk insurance are not the reasons why our cargoes are not moving.

REAL REASON FOR BILL.

But these gentlemen come before us and say solemnly, "We want these cargoes carried in American ships," and I am very glad to have them say so, and I think everyone in this House would like to have these cargoes carried in American vessels and would be glad to do any reasonable thing to have them so carried. But they state cargoes can not be carried in American vessels until this Government does what other Governments have arranged to do and inaugurates a system of war insurance to take care of the balances of insurance which the ordinary insurance companies can not assume of these war risks.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let me just finish this thought. There is an abundance of cargo capacity in foreign vessels to take all of our crops right now, and it will continue throughout this season undoubtedly. Remember that the English, Belgian, and French Governments have departments of war insurance to take the war risks which ordinary insurance can not or will not assume. But they have to do so. They must have our goods and they can not wait or take any chances. Their situation is entirely different from ours, where all ships and all nations must seek our shores and buy our crops and transport them at their own risk. We need not concern ourselves about that.

Now, these gentlemen came before the Committee on Interstate Commerce and made this statement, that the marine-insurance companies number in all about 16; and these companies can carry on a single vessel and cargo about $1,000,000 worth of marine insurance among themselves, adjusting and allotting it as best they can; that the average amount needed on a cargo is about $1,500,000, some more and others less; and they desired that the United States should assume the risk as to the extra $500,000 on the average cargo; and that is what this bill is expected to do, with the marine-insurance companies insuring all they believe they ought safely to insure. The effect of the statement is that they wish the United States to take the balance of $500,000, which they feel they can not safely divide among themselves.

RESULT DESIRED.

The result is that the United States is asked to go into the insurance business temporarily for the sake of supplementing the resources of the insurance companies, assuming the risk for the sake of securing American tonnage to do the work which other tonnage could do equally as well. Now, that is the exact analysis of that situation as disclosed by the hearings, debates, proceedings of the committee, and the preamble to the bill itself, having in view the conditions of supply of foreign tonnage.

The facts show that our crops are moving in good volume; they are paid for as they go; that more will go as needed and paid for, but that foreign ships will carry the most of the exports. But American ships carry their full share, and so far no discrimination has appeared because England assumes war risks as to its own vessels.

No American ship has been yet shown to have lost a cargo, by reason of lack of this insurance, to a British vessel having its governmental insurance. I believe no such case exists. But we did pass a bill a week or so ago enabling foreign-built ships of any age owned by our own citizens to secure the register of the United States. It is now urged that these old ships can not afford to leave their present flag to assume ours unless we can give them equal benefits they now have of securing war-risk insurance from the Government itself. That is the argument and reason presented for this legislation.

WAR RISKS.

The substance of it is that the United States assumes this risk, which has a definite money value in the insurance world. It can be computed accurately in dollars and cents by actuaries and forms a component part of any premium or charge and liability. We are asked to assume this risk of dollars and cents, as so computed and understood, to have these gentlemen fly the American flag and carry cargoes on foreign vessels which others could carry equally as well, or which these would otherwise carry under some other flag. That is simply a subsidy, no more and no less, for the sake of encouraging foreign vessels to fly the American flag temporarily to carry these cargoes, which would be carried anyway at equally good rates. I have voted for a ship subsidy in the past when I thought it would be for the advantage of the American people. I will vote for a ship subsidy again when I think it is for the advantage of the American people; but I call attention of gentlemen on the majority side of the Chamber exactly to what this proposition is—that it is nothing more nor less than a ship subsidy on foreign-built vessels to shift their flags for the sake of carrying cargoes which could be carried just as well and as cheaply in some other way. It is designed to encourage men to take vessels temporarily from a foreign flag and place them under an American flag. There is no showing or statement or promise that this shall be at all permanent. It is not claimed to be. It is only for the present emergency, to shift flags until it shall profit to shift back again. That is a fair analysis of what this measure is. I would not condemn it on that ground if it would result in any benefit to the American people. I confess the benefit to the people of this country has not been made plain to me. Our goods are being carried abroad right now, and the conditions promise to improve. These same ships will do business under other flags, with the same officers and crews, at the same rates. There is no expectation by this of building a permanent marine unless additional legislation be secured, and that is problematical. The total result is only a temporary shifting of flags under this bill. As I say, I have voted for ship subsidies, and I am willing to vote again for ship subsidies if such a policy will really benefit the American people. Let us ascertain whether this subsidy will be for the benefit of the American people.

EXTENT OF RISKS.

The war risks will not extend to South America, practically, because there is no war zone there. They will not extend to Africa for the same reason. They will not extend to Asia outside of the limited war zone now in German China. So that practically these risks will only extend to the belligerent sections of Europe and to the neutral sections of Europe which are within the war zone. Thus it would seem to be the sole purpose of this bill to issue this additional amount of war-risk insurance and apply it to vessels and their cargoes plying between the United States and the war territory in Europe, neutral or belligerent.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. I want to inquire whether foreign commerce in agricultural products now being shipped abroad is taken as a war risk by private companies?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; it is; and I will come to that a little later. The point is this: In the great bulk of cases whenever agricultural products are exported they are sold here in this country and the title passes whenever the purchaser receives the bill of lading with the bill of exchange attached. That transfers the title, and always has been so held. So, in the great majority of cases, because most exports are now made in that way, the risk is assumed in this country by the foreigner. He ships it in any vessel he pleases, and generally in foreign vessels, so that the risk is taken care of and assumed now by foreign vessels and insurance companies and Governments, if necessary, for the public use.

I do not believe that this legislation will change that situation. Our people will not sell unless they are paid. When paid, the foreigner controls the shipment; and there is no complaint as to ample facilities now for such goods. Our importers may complain some, but the ships which go out must come in, and they will gladly take our imports.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to ask the gentleman whether this insurance will be confined to cargoes from American ports?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The bill does not so confine its object, but that is the purpose of it, as it has been explained to us, contraband. Now, then, this bill is designed to carry cargoes to and from the United States to the belligerent territory. What kind of cargoes will be covered by this bill? It is stated, I think, by the President, and I think it was stated by those gentlemen who appeared before our committee and upon this floor that no contraband goods should be carried under this war-risk insurance. The House has had several discussions as to what constitutes contraband goods. Of course absolute contraband goods could not be carried in any vessel except it be subject to seizure. Conditional contraband goods can under certain circumstances be carried. The Governments of Great Britain and Germany notified the Department of State that they had adopted the rules set forth in the declaration of London, and described the articles which they regarded as contraband and conditional contraband. Those have been officially promulgated by the Department of State, and these articles named in the statement will not be covered by war insurance, as those gentlemen have stated to us. I here insert the list of contraband articles set forth in the declaration of the international naval conference at London July 26, 1909, and as ratified by the United States Senate and as proclaimed by both Germany and Great Britain.

The message from the German Government, owing to errors in transmission, is somewhat obscure, but it is assumed to coincide with the English declaration and to define contraband as follows:

Absolute contraband:
Arms of all kinds, including arms for sporting purposes, and their distinctive component parts.
Projectiles, charges, and cartridges of all kinds and their distinctive component parts.
Powder and explosives especially prepared for use in war.
Gun mountings, limber boxes, military wagons, field forges, and their distinctive component parts.
Clothing and equipment of a distinctively military character.
All kinds of harness of a distinctly military character.
Saddle, draft, and pack animals suitable for use in war.
Articles of camp equipment and their distinctive component parts.
Armor plates.
Warships, including boats, and their distinctive component parts of such a nature that they can be only used on a vessel of war.
Aeroplanes, airships, balloons, and air craft of all kinds and their component parts, together with accessories and articles recognizable as intended for use in connection with balloons and air craft.
Implements and apparatus designed exclusively for the manufacture of munitions of war, for the manufacture or repair of arms and war material for use on land and sea.

CONDITIONAL CONTRABAND.

The following articles will be treated as conditional contraband:
Foodstuffs.
Forage and grain suitable for feeding animals.
Clothing, fabrics for clothing, and boots and shoes suitable for use in war.
Gold and silver, in coin or bullion, paper money.
Vehicles of all kinds available for use in war and their component parts.
Vessels, crafts, and boats of all kinds, floating docks, parts of docks, and their component parts.
Railway material, both fixed and rolling stock, and materials for telegraphs, wireless telegraphs, and telephones.
Fuel, lubricants.
Powder and explosives not specially prepared for use in war.
Barbed wire and implements for fixing and cutting the same.
Horseshoes and shoeing materials.
Harness and saddlery.
Field glasses, telescopes, chronometers, and all kinds of nautical instruments.

From this list it is evident that most of our agricultural exports, except cotton, will fall within the prohibited list and so can not secure this war-risk insurance.

The great mass of exports, even of manufactures, will not be covered by this war insurance at all. The great bulk of the exports, I presume 75 per cent, outside of cotton and cotton goods—and of course cotton and cotton goods are not contraband—outside of that I do not know but that 80 per cent would be covered by articles that I have read which would be prohibited from this insurance. I can not perceive its value from this condition. I do not believe that vessels which would carry these cargoes would leave flags where they can get this governmental insurance and come to our flag, where they can not, if such a bonus be the main purpose of the transfer of flag.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is there any provision in the bill that forbids the insurance of contraband goods?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all.

Mr. TEMPLE. The bill provides for the insurance of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war, and so forth.

Is it not true that the British bureau of insurance for war risks does insure contraband goods?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is true.

Mr. TEMPLE. And if we followed the example of other nations we would insure contraband goods?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and I think the House appreciates the great importance of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just stated. It is stated to us that under the bill contraband goods will not be insured. If it does not, it can not be used to insure much of anything except cotton and cotton goods. So only vessels carrying such goods could profit by this bill and come under our flag. This number will be small, as we all know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied 20 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will take 10 minutes more. If it does insure contraband goods, then in substance we violate our obligations and professions of neutrality to the great belligerent nations of the world. We have the two alternatives. If we do not insure contraband goods, this bill is practically worthless. It can only cover a portion of our exports which will move anyway whenever the nations are ready to use and pay for our cotton. This is not needed for such goods and it can not be used for other agricultural products, because they would be mostly contraband.

If we do insure contraband, then we lose our proud position of neutrality, and would be unable in the future to help these great belligerent powers when the time shall come when we can tender mediation and try to help to adjust these momentous matters. It seems to me that this is one of the great questions of humanity, that we should not do anything in any way which would interfere with our position of absolute neutrality, in spirit as well as in letter. [Applause.]

The result is that we can not, as the President has stated and as those who are responsible for this legislation have stated, fairly and honestly insure contraband. If we do not insure contraband, then there is practically nothing else to insure, except cotton, and that does not need insurance, because it is not contraband of war, and it can and will be purchased here as much as it can be used and paid for abroad. Foreign ships exist in abundance to take it abroad, and it will be purchased just as soon as foreign nations are willing to pay for it in gold.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is not grain conditional contraband?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I so stated. What can be done about the foreign ships to which my friend from Missouri alluded the other day? I confess that gives me much concern. The French Government, I notice this morning, served notice yesterday that it would object to the United States purchasing the German ships. I think the French Government need have no apprehension upon that score. Those great German ships are the finest ships in the world. The only place where they can be used profitably is in plying between the ports of the United States and of Europe, and the only ports where they can enter are the ports of the United States and England, because no continental ports of account are open, and I know that the German Government and the German people would prefer to have them rot rather than that those ships would be used to carry supplies to their enemies. They can not be used elsewhere, and I do not think anybody should have any apprehension upon that score; so that this insurance can not fit them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman not think it very unwise, then, for the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report out to this House a bill authorizing the Government to buy the German ships?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do; but I have the greatest confidence in the judgment and patriotism and soundness of the gentleman from Missouri, as he knows.

Mr. PLATT. And those ships are not cargo-carrying ships?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They carry considerable amounts of cargo.

Mr. PLATT. But only express cargo.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They carry considerable amounts of peculiar and expensive cargo. I think the House should comprehend the condition also as to insurance in this country, because statements were made to our committee that sufficient insurance could not be secured to take this additional risk of about $500,000 per cargo, where the average cargo would require about a million and a half dollars, and that the utmost insurance available for war risk was about a million dollars. It was stated that there are about 16 companies in and of the United States which could carry this marine insurance in this way, and are now actually doing this business. This House realizes, I know, that I have never ascribed any ulterior motives to anybody, and I do not desire to do it now in discussion of this important subject. But with all due deliberation I do point out to this House the inevitable consequence of passing this bill on the subject of marine insurance in the United States. Some of those marine underwriters were before our committee the other day at the hearings and made a rather inadequate showing to us.

These gentlemen stated that there are 16 companies eligible to take marine insurance right now, and would take it. I sent to the Department of Commerce, to the Bureau of Corporations, and the Bureau of Navigation and asked for all of the information which they had upon the subject of marine insurance, and could get none. I sent to the Library and asked them to send over to my office whatever they had available on marine insurance, and they did send a barrel of stuff. Among the material was an article, "Marine Insurance in the United States," by Dr. Huebner, if I am rightly informed, who conducted the investigation for the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on the subject of recent shipping combinations and contracts, so that he is admirably qualified to discuss that subject from a thoroughly disinterested standpoint. I shall cite from his article on marine insurance in the United States in my remarks, but will not take the time now to quote it. The Library also sent American Marine, by Capt. W. W. Bates, one of the old commissioners of navigation, who probably has done more than any other in his day to urge a policy of discriminating duties for the benefit of upbuilding the American merchant marine. These two gentlemen show this condition: That there are 31 companies in the United States which have the charter rights to issue marine insurance, and in past years have exercised these rights by issuing more or less marine insurance. The Library also sent over the last insurance Year-Book of 1914, the most authoritative publication now used, which gives the names of those companies, and it is correct that only 16 are actively doing business in marine insurance and would now issue war risks. The others are confining themselves principally to fire insurance. The reason why these other 15 companies are not doing business in marine insurance seems to be this, as both of these authors state: The various States are discriminating against American marine insurance companies in favor of foreign marine insurance companies in this way: The State will allow the foreign company to place only a minimum amount of securities in the United States as the basis for their payment of losses.

The result of that is that the foreign companies do much more business on the same capital investment than any American company is allowed to do, and correspondingly the foreign company pays less taxes on the amount of its business capital than does the American company. I checked these facts up as well as I could in this last number of the insurance Year Book and found it substantially true. The result is that under the policy of our States for the past few years the foreign companies have crowded out the American companies, with the exception of these 16. I found also in this insurance Year Book that there were many mutual companies doing business in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, but I judged these were fire-insurance companies which did no marine business. The remaining 15 companies do principally a fire-insurance business, but they have the same capacity to do the marine business, and, of course, the mutual companies can do both if they prepare for it. This Year Book also gave a list of 40 Lloyd companies doing business last year, which Lloyd companies are based on the old Lloyd system of mutual underwriting, which probably could be applied to marine insurance at once. If it can apply to fire it equally can to marine risks, and that would require but little time for preparation. They insured about $10,000,000 last year. Again, some of the advertising in this very Year Book is that of the underwriters' agencies, which are nothing but Lloyd concerns, which would do this very kind of business if given an opportunity, and be allowed to prepare for it. Then I notice that some of the great steamship companies do their own insuring, which would enable more war-risk insurance to be placed by our own companies on their vessels if necessary.

These facts seem to me to clearly disclose that eliminating the risks assumed by the foreign Governments on the bulk of our exports, because the foreigners purchase and secure title here, there would be abundant capital to care for the remaining risks in American vessels if it be properly marshaled and encouraged, and not driven out by hostile State and governmental action.

In addition there are seven foreign companies from neutral nations given in the Year Book which would seem to be open to this kind of business, but I am not considering them.

RESULTS.

The result is this, as you see: These 16 companies wish to assume and actually now do take a million dollars' worth of insurance on each average vessel and cargo. They claim that the average cargo requires a million and a half insurance—five hundred thousand more than they care to safely take. They desire that this extra insurance shall be taken by the United States, and if so, that these old foreign vessels will then register temporarily in the United States. If this Government does so, that would prevent any more American companies entering the marine insurance field. If the United States once enters this field and supplies this deficiency it would give those gentlemen practically a monopoly of the existing market. These 16 companies practically have a monopoly in the American field now, and naturally desire to continue such profitable conditions. The books show that, in addition to these 16 companies now doing business, such old companies as the Richmond Fire & Marine, the Detroit Fire & Marine, the Springfield Fire & Marine, the Minneapolis Fire & Marine, the Northwestern Fire & Marine, and companies of that kind could easily write marine risks if they had the opportunity, but are more or less crowded out of the field by this very legislation we are proposing here. That is one of the evils of this measure, against which I enter protest.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the structure of the legislation which accomplishes this purpose. Remember that insurance is not a governmental function; it is not a sovereign act of the United States. The United States Supreme Court has held several times that marine insurance is neither commerce nor the instrumentality of commerce. It is simply an incident to commerce, just the same as a promissory note or an open account or something like that; so that marine insurance can not be regulated by an act of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield myself 10 minutes additional. So that marine insurance as an act or instrumentality of commerce can not be regulated by an act of Congress. Its governmental regulation must be as a part of the police power of the various States. That has been settled time and again by the decisions of the Supreme Court, which is not subject to dispute; so that this bill simply puts the United States in the insurance business just exactly on the same basis as any other insurance corporation doing the same business, with no other rights or privileges than have any other insurance corporations.

If it does business in any State, it must do such business in accordance with the laws of that State. It must accommodate itself to these laws as to capital stock and resources and reserves; it must pay the license fees; if agents are registered, they must pay the license fee; they must pay the State taxes, as provided by the State law. Now, nothing of that sort is provided for in this bill. Now, these doctrines I state are well illustrated and settled in the South Carolina Dispensary case. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the dispensary of South Carolina was not a sovereign act of the State, but an act of the State acting as a corporation doing a private business. That is exactly the same way that the United States will do business under this insurance act. The result is this, that the United States would act as a private corporation, doing a legal business only where it is authorized to do business. Now, where is it authorized to do business under this bill? Solely in the city of Washington, D. C., and nowhere else. It can not have agents outside. It can only do business here. Now, what kind of a business does it do? Sections 2 and 3 prescribe for the insurance of freight and passage moneys and cargoes to be shipped, either imported or exported cargoes. That means whole cargoes, not part cargoes—whole cargoes. The result is that when this insurance is sought for it will be applied for in the usual way in one of the great commercial cities—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore. The gentlemen desiring insurance will go to an insurance broker and state exactly what they need, and he will go to a marine company to place it in the usual way. This company will insure the usual risks in the usual way for the market sum, and will then insure the war risk up to a million dollars, and will then reinsure such as it deems best and allot this reinsurance to those who will carry on its terms. They will then send to this bureau to insure the balance of a half a million dollars, which it is claimed the existing companies can not safely assume. That is the way this insurance will be actually done, and it is the only way it can be legally done. Insure the whole cargo through one of the other companies and place the deficiency not taken by others through the office here.

The result is you see by this cunning arrangement all competition outside of the present active lines is effectively eliminated. This method laid down in this bill gives these 16 gentlemen running these companies a complete monopoly during the existence of this legislation in the marine-insurance business in the United States.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. DECKER. What is the condition of competition between these 16 companies now?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not think there is very much. I admit to the gentleman from Missouri I do not think very much, but this will make it worse instead of better.

This will eliminate competitors instead of encouraging them to enter. Now, these writers upon marine insurance all lay down this proposition. We can not have an effective merchant marine in the United States unless we have three things: First, ships; second, shipyards; and, third, American marine insurance. This bill will prevent the development of an honest American marine insurance.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. As a matter of fact, do we not take $5,000,000 of the money of the people of the United States, set it apart, and say to those who are engaged in a business of great hazard, "Take the risk, and, if you lose, the people of the country, to the extent of $5,000,000, will stand the loss?"

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; it is that, and worse. It is worse because it accomplishes, in addition, the result I have stated. It encourages, if that business is to be done, the violation of our position of neutrality, possibly not a technical violation, but an actual violation, because it can be only done for the benefit of one class of belligerents—England, France, and Belgium.

The advantage can not be had under any circumstances by Germany or Austria. That of itself constitutes a practical, not a technical, violation of our neutral position which ought not to be tolerated by our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman stated in his remarks when he first opened the discussion that this country, being a neutral country, could not ship goods that were contraband.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We can ship anything.

Mr. CLINE. You do not get my question. That would in any way reach either one of the belligerents.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; our people can ship anything we please. Our people can ship absolute or conditional contraband if they wish to take their chances.

Mr. CLINE. And still maintain our neutrality?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Our citizens can ship anything, but that is not an act of the Government itself. It does not involve the Government. This does, and that is the vice of it.

Mr. CLINE. Suppose this bill should pass and the Government should send what would be an unnecessary supply of wheat to Holland to supply the local demand; is the Government bound to follow that wheat further than delivered to the consignee in order to preserve this neutrality?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; and again, yes. As to conditional contraband the searching ships of England would have no right to go beyond the ship's papers. But if at some time conditions existed, such as the gentleman has stated, that are unnatural—that is, the ship would be outside the usual course, or the ship is carrying an unusual amount for the usual market conditions of Holland, that would be a matter of decision for the prize court and would open the question of violation of neutral rights.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I wished, and have only discussed the question, as you realize, in a superficial and cursory way, but there is one other necessary conclusion that seems to me should be considered in connection with this legislation. This is a great emergency. We are all wondering what ought to be done under a condition new and untried. At the same time, it seems to me, before we embark upon any revolutionary step, before we attempt to put this Government into any new sphere of public activity, we should realize that it will be but the basis of other proceedings like these some time or probably in the very near future. Our action on this measure will be used as a precedent hereafter. If we sell insurance, we can similarly sell any other commodity of general use. If we sell we can equally buy and deal in any articles. We are asked to buy cotton, grain, naval stores, tobacco, silver, and what not to-morrow. I am unwilling that this Government should embark in a private business where our citizens can do it as well or better than the United States itself. I believe that this business can and will be carried on by the existing agencies better than the United States can do it. There is no need for this mad haste. There is no such emergency as warrants such a radical departure by our Government. I believe that the American crops can be moved. I believe that the American resources can be developed to meet this emergency better than this bill can do it, notwithstanding the great and overwhelming opinion of those 62 eminent gentlemen whose judgment is entitled to the utmost respect in the United States. But if we do this for them, in justice we must treat our other citizens in the South and West equally and along the same lines. One departure for private benefit, though ostensibly for public, will be quickly followed by a multitude of more important ventures. The consequences will be evil. It will sap the integrity, energy, and initiative of our people. It will destroy their sense of personal resource and responsibility. I can conceive of few greater evils for our country and its future. But I have given to the House my best judgment upon the facts as I have found them. And I do not believe under these circumstances that this legislation should be started as a precedent for future action which may result unfortunately for our Government and eventually may impair our institutions. We can not stand still in this path. Once we enter we shall pursue it steadily and along broader lines. And for this reason, reluctant as I have been in this emergency to seem opposed to matters which are deemed essential, I feel obliged to oppose this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] five minutes, or such portion thereof as he may desire to use.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those opposed to the Government going into any class of business; but this is an exigency of such importance that we have to break away from the rule to protect our shipping and the exportation of our products. At the present time there are a large number of vessels waiting for cargoes, but they are unable to obtain the same, as the shippers can not secure any war-risk insurance.

In the past Great Britain has been the principal insurer against war through the underwriters at London—Lloyds; but since the breaking out of the war in Europe the British Government has assumed these risks to the extent of 80 per cent, the remaining 20 per cent being insured with clubs at London—Lloyds. The rate is fixed by the Government from day to day, but it does not exceed 5 per cent per voyage on the value of the steamer.

Application for this insurance must be made to the war-risks office in London, either personally or through a London broker. Provisional value must then be fixed and premium paid on this value. The ordinary insurance risks on such cargo must be covered with marine underwriters at London—Lloyds—or with British insurance companies or other approved companies or underwriters, and claims under the Government war-risk insurance will be settled on the valuation fixed by such marine insurance, but not exceeding the provisional value declared in the application to the Government war-risks office. All reputable English or American companies will be approved, and their evidence as to insured value will be accepted as a basis for settlement of claims under the Government war-risk insurance. Losses are payable at once.

A uniform rate for all voyages is fixed from time to time by the British Government for this war-risk insurance. To-day the rate is 4.2 per cent, and at the present time there is little prospect that this rate will be changed. If the pending bill is passed, our rate will be as low as 1 per cent. There are certain prohibited areas, namely, no continental ports north of East Scheldt and no Adriatic ports.

I feel confident that after the passage of this bill the foreign-exchange situation will materially improve.

Mr. Chairman, the following is section 2 of the bill H. R. 18202, an act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his discretion the needs of foreign commerce may require, to suspend by order, so far and for such length of time as he may deem desirable, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

I consider this particular section one of the most important to our shipping interests, and I feel confident our distinguished and far-seeing President will take advantage and declare the section operative within the next few days.

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print in connection herewith a pamphlet entitled "Information for American Shippers," issued by the New York Chamber of Commerce, as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the information referred to:

INFORMATION FOR AMERICAN SHIPPERS.

The liability of goods shipped by American merchants to be captured as prizes of war depends upon a number of circumstances—the destination of the goods; the ownership of the goods, actual or presumptive, after shipment; the character of the goods, whether contraband or not; and the nationality of the carrier.

Goods shipped by American shippers to a neutral destination are exempt from capture, whether shipped on an American or other neutral ship or on a belligerent ship.

The only exception to this rule is where the goods, though shipped to a neutral destination, are intended to be transshipped or forwarded to a hostile destination—a fact which the captor must prove in order to justify the capture.

Shipments by Americans made in good faith to neutrals in a neutral port can never be considered as contraband; it is the destination of the goods and not their character which makes them contraband.

The title to goods shipped on the basis of cost, insurance, and freight, or cost and freight, ordinarily vests in the buyer on shipment. If such goods are consigned to a belligerent port, they at once become enemy's goods as to all other belligerents, and as such are subject to capture except when carried in a neutral bottom.

The character of goods, whether contraband or not, becomes important only where the shipment is made to a belligerent port.

Contraband is of two classes, absolute and conditional. Absolute contraband is subject to capture even in an American bottom. Goods known as conditional contraband are not subject to capture in an American or other neutral or a belligerent bottom, unless destined for the use of the armed forces or of a Government department of the enemy State, or consigned to enemy authorities, or a contractor for such authorities, or to a fortified place belonging to the enemy, or other place serving as a base for the armed forces of the enemy. As, however, the prize court of the captor has jurisdiction to determine the latter question, shippers should contemplate the possibility that both classes of contraband may possibly be seized and condemned.

The latest classification of absolute and conditional contraband is contained in the declaration of London of February 26, 1909. This has been ratified by our Government, but not by the other Governments which were parties to it. It is valuable, however, as a statement of what has been heretofore regarded by experts in international law and the prize courts of certain countries as absolute contraband, conditional contraband, and exempt classes of cargo. The provisions of the declaration are these:

"The following articles may, without notice, be treated as contraband of war, under the name of absolute contraband:

"(1) Arms of all kinds, including arms for sporting purposes, and their distinctive component parts.

"(2) Projectiles, charges, and cartridges of all kinds, and their distinctive component parts.

"(3) Powder and explosives specially prepared for use in war.

"(4) Gun mountings, limber boxes, limbers, military wagons, field forges, and their distinctive component parts.

"(5) Clothing and equipment of a distinctively military character.

"(6) All kinds of harness of a distinctively military character.

"(7) Saddle, draft, and pack animals suitable for use in war.

"(8) Articles of camp equipment, and their distinctive component parts.

"(9) Armor plates.

"(10) Warships, including boats and their distinctive component parts of such a nature that they can only be used on a vessel of war.

"(11) Implements and apparatus designed exclusively for the manufacture of munitions of war, for the manufacture or repair of arms or war material for use on land or sea.

"The following articles, susceptible of use in war as well as for purposes of peace, may, without notice, be treated as contraband of war under the name of conditional contraband:

"(1) Foodstuffs.

"(2) Forage and grain, suitable for feeding animals.

"(3) Clothing, fabrics for clothing, and boots and shoes, suitable for use in war.

"(4) Gold and silver in coin or bullion; paper money.

"(5) Vehicles of all kinds available for use in war, and their component parts.

"(6) Vessels, craft, and boats of all kinds; floating docks, parts of docks, and their component parts.

"(7) Railway material, both fixed and rolling stock, and material for telegraphs, wireless telegraphs, and telephones.

"(8) Balloons and flying machines and their distinctive component parts, together with accessories and articles recognizable as intended for use in connection with balloons and flying machines.

"(9) Fuel; lubricants.

"(10) Powder and explosives not specially prepared for use in war.

"(11) Barbed wire and implements for fixing and cutting the same.

"(12) Horseshoes and shoeing materials.

"(13) Harness and saddlery.

"(14) Field glasses, telescopes, chronometers, and all kinds of nautical instruments."

It is to be understood that each belligerent has the power to declare additional articles susceptible of use in war as well as for the purpose of peace to be conditional contraband.

Great Britain has already issued her proclamation of contraband, dated August 5, 1914, which follows explicitly the declaration of London except in one respect, namely, that it transfers flying machines from conditional to absolute contraband.

The declaration of London also provides "that the following may not be declared contraband of war:

"(1) Raw cotton, wool, silk, jute, flax, hemp, and other raw materials of the textile industries, and yarns of the same.

"(2) Oil seeds and nuts; copra.

"(3) Rubber, resin, gums, and lacs; hops.

"(4) Raw hides and horns, bones, and ivory.

"(5) Natural and artificial manures, including nitrates and phosphates for agricultural purposes.

"(6) Metallic ores.

"(7) Earths, clays, lime, chalk; stone, including marble, bricks, slates, and tiles.

"(8) Chinaware and glass.

"(9) Paper and paper-making materials.

"(10) Soap, paint and colors, including articles exclusively used in their manufacture, and varnish.

"(11) Bleaching powder, soda, ash, caustic soda, salt, cake, ammonia, sulphate of ammonia, and sulphate of copper.

"(12) Agricultural, mining, textile, and printing machinery.

"(13) Precious and semiprecious stones, pearls, mother-of-pearl, and coral.

"(14) Clocks and watches, other than chronometers.

"(15) Fashion and fancy goods.

"(16) Feathers of all kinds, hairs, and bristles.

"(17) Articles of household furniture and decoration; office furniture and requisites."

In the event of the capture of a belligerent ship, the practice of nations requires that she be taken before a prize court in the country of the captor for adjudication. An exception to this rule has been recognized in cases where it may be impossible, or practically so, for the captor to take his prize to a prize court, in which event he may sink the ship. It may thus result that a neutral cargo will also be destroyed. If the ship be taken into a prize court, that court determines, in accordance with its own jurisprudence, whether the cargo shall be condemned as enemy property or as contraband, or shall be released to its owner as neutral. It is evident, therefore, that the owners of goods shipped in a belligerent ship to any destination or in a neutral ship to a belligerent destination are subject to risks which they will wish to cover by insurance.

The ordinary policy of marine insurance would cover war risks in addition to the usual fire and marine risks but for the following clause:

"Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war."

The risks thus excluded from the protection of an ordinary marine policy may be covered by a war-risk policy. The forms of such policies vary widely, but it is the general intent of all of them to cover such risks as are excluded from the ordinary marine policy by the terms of the foregoing warranty.

The principal risks of the owner of goods in a captured ship may be summarized as follows:

1. The cargo may be sunk with the ship, or condemned by the prize court of the captor as enemy's goods or as contraband.

The loss is not covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

2. The goods may be lost, or damaged by reason of the ship striking a mine or otherwise coming within the range of hostilities.

The loss is not covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

3. Goods released by the prize court as neutral may be damaged in the course of unloading, storage, or reloading.

Losses of this nature would not be covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

4. Extra charges and expenses in connection with forwarding released goods from the port of the prize court to their original destination would not be covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

5. The owner of the released goods may suffer loss due to a deterioration in the quality of goods owing to their inherent nature, a depreciation in price, a loss of market, or a loss of interest in consequence of delay in obtaining the release of his goods by the prize court.

Such losses are not covered either by the ordinary form of marine policy nor by a war-risk policy.

NEW YORK, August 12, 1914.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). Thirty minutes.

Mr. MANN. How much time has the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-two.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr TALCOTT].

Mr. TALCOTT of New York Mr Chairman, this bill is an emergency measure. War creates new risks separate and distinct from the usual marine risks and the insurance of these is necessary if ships are to move from port to port. This bill does not deal with ordinary marine insurance; only with risks arising and proceeding from the warfare existing in different parts of the world. Its effect in the main may be regulative. When a short time ago insurance upon English ships and their cargoes against risks of war became so high as to be almost prohibitive, I am informed that the English Government fixed a rate at which it would insure against these risks, and premiums asked by insurers soon fell to the level of the Government rate. This bill will render more effective the provisions of the bill passed a short time ago extending the registry of foreign-built ships. We must protect our trade if we expect to have any. And if individuals and corporations are unwilling to insure against war risks on reasonable terms, Congress must provide a way by which it can be done. This is the purpose of the pending bill.

It provides for the establishment in the Treasury Department of the bureau of war-risk insurance, the director and employees of which shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury; the salary of director to be $6,000, and of other employees to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case to exceed $5,000 per annum. All employees receiving salaries of $3,000 or less are to be subject to civil service.

The bureau is to make provision for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freight, passage, and cargoes therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary, it may appear that American vessels, shippers, or importers are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance. The bureau, with the approval of the Secretary, is authorized to adopt and publish a form of war-risk policy and to fix reasonable rates of premium for the insurance of American vessels, their freight, passage, moneys, and their cargoes against war risks. The proceeds of the premiums are to be covered into the Treasury, and the bureau is further given powers, with the approval of the Secretary, to make any and all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of the act.

Further, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish an advisory board, to consist of three members skilled in war-risk insurance, for the purpose of assisting the bureau in fixing rates of premium, adjustment of losses, and generally in carrying out the purposes of the act, their compensation to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. In case of disagreement as to the claim or the amount thereof between the bureau and the parties in interest, an action on the claim may be brought in the district court of the United States, sitting in admiralty, in the district in which the claimant or the agent resides.

Provision is made for the adjustment and payment of losses. Appropriation of $5,000,000 is made for losses and $100,000 for the establishment and maintenance of the bureau of war-risk insurance. In conclusion, it is provided that the President shall terminate the operation of the act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance shall have ceased and shall abolish the bureau as soon as its work has been completed.

Now, it seems to me that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] are unnecessarily alarmed in regard to the possible violation of neutrality.

In the first place, contraband covers only a portion of the exports of the country at the present time, or at any time during the past year. Outside of the articles which are contraband or conditionally contraband, and which the Governments of England and Germany have declared to be contraband, there is a vast amount of export trade. The articles which are contraband cover only a page or a page and a half of ordinary print, whereas the articles which are not contraband cover many pages of the Statistical Abstract. Take not only cotton and cotton cloths, but take also all textiles; take fruits and nuts; take leather goods, which are exported in large quantities—and all these, for the most part, are outside of the rules in relation to contraband, and all will be insurable under this bill.

Then take the regions to be reached. Why, Denmark and Norway and Sweden and Spain and Portugal and Italy, so far as Europe alone is concerned, are open to our exports—not only to the exports that are not contraband, but to the exports that would be contraband if sent to a belligerent; and this vast commerce, so far as Europe alone is concerned, will amount to millions of dollars. In addition to that, there is the trade of South America and the trade with the part of the Orient not affected by the war. So that outside of the question of contraband, outside of the zone of warfare, there is a vast amount of commerce which can be insured under the provisions of this bill.

This measure, which has been brought forward to meet the emergency existing by reason of war, is often referred to as intended to serve an opportunity for commercial advantage only. It is no doubt true it will serve that purpose. It will render commerce possible, enable the crops to move from warehouse to seaport, and from our seaports to different ports of the world; but it also presents an opportunity of a higher kind, for when privation and suffering come to many lands now involved in war, as they must come, this country will be enabled to extend the help which must be given in the cause of a common humanity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to use some of his time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it should be thoroughly understood just what is involved in the bill under consideration. We are asked to create as one of the bureaus of our Government an insurance department, whose duty it shall be to engage in the extrahazardous business of war-risk insurance. We are asked to appropriate $5,100,000 therefor from the Treasury of the United States.

It is not contended that the United States as a permanent policy should engage in the insurance business. It is not argued that it will be profitable to do so. On the contrary, it is stated as a reason why the United States should undertake the enterprise that marine-insurance companies already engaged in the business are unwilling or unable to issue these war-risk policies. If it is a profitable venture, private capital would furnish the funds. If it is safe, private enterprise would take the risk. But because it is neither profitable nor safe therefore it is urged that the United States should undertake it.

NO GROUNDS FOR SUCH AN ACT.

The grounds on which this extraordinary proposal is justified are rather obscure. It is a war measure, we are told. But we are not at war. England, France, and Belgium insure their vessels against war risk, it is said. But they are at war. They are compelled to do so, else their merchant vessels would not dare leave their harbors. Each one so venturing is liable to capture anywhere on the high seas, no matter what it carries nor for what port destined. Not so the United States. Her ships may sail on any sea. They may enter any harbor not actually blockaded. They may carry any cargo not contraband of war. They are not liable to capture unless they violate some law of neutrality.

We are at perfect liberty to trade with all the neutral nations of the world, and as to that trade there is no war risk for which insurance is needed. We are at perfect liberty to trade with any belligerent nation provided we do not deal with articles which are contraband of war. As to such trade no war-risk insurance is needed. If by the passage of this act American vessels are induced to attempt the transportation and delivery to any of the belligerent nations of articles which are contraband of war, then the Government itself will be guilty of a violation of the laws of neutrality and will involve itself with the powers at war.

CONTRABAND OF WAR.

It is stated by the advocates of this bill that it is not proposed to insure contraband goods. But the bill does not so provide. Such an omission is too important not to have been intended. And when it is considered that unless contraband goods are to be insured there is little need of war-risk insurance, the intent is clear that the object of the bill is to induce and guarantee the shipment of goods which are contraband of war.

Articles are contraband of war which are or may be used by a belligerent in aid of its warfare. They are not limited to arms and ammunitions, but include all articles which either inherently or by use may aid in warfare. Two classes are recognized absolute and conditional contraband. By the declaration of London, promulgated February 26, 1909, to which the United States is a party and by which Germany, Great Britain, Belgium, and France have declared they will be governed, the following are declared absolute contraband:

(1) Arms of all kinds, including arms for sporting purposes, and their distinctive component parts.
(2) Projectiles, charges, and cartridges of all kinds, and their distinctive component parts.
(3) Powder and explosives specially prepared for use in war.
(4) Gun mountings, limber boxes, limbers, military wagons, field forges, and their distinctive component parts.
(5) Clothing and equipment of a distinctively military character.
(6) All kinds of harness of a distinctively military character.
(7) Saddle, draft, and pack animals suitable for use in war.
(8) Articles of camp equipment, and their distinctive component parts.
(9) Armor plates.
(10) Warships, including boats and their distinctive component parts of such a nature that they can only be used on a vessel of war.
(11) Implements and apparatus designed exclusively for the manufacture of munitions of war, for the manufacture or repair of arms or war material for use on land or sea.

The following are declared conditional contraband:

(1) Foodstuffs.
(2) Forage and grain, suitable for feeding animals.
(3) Clothing, fabrics for clothing, and boots and shoes, suitable for use in war.
(4) Gold and silver in coin or bullion; paper money.
(5) Vehicles of all kinds available for use in war, and their component parts.
(6) Vessels, craft, and boats of all kinds; floating docks, parts of docks, and their component parts.
(7) Railway material, both fixed and rolling stock, and material for telegraphs, wireless telegraphs, and telephones.
(8) Balloons and flying machines and their distinctive component parts, together with accessories and articles recognizable as intended for use in connection with balloons and flying machines.
(9) Fuel; lubricants.
(10) Powder and explosives not specially prepared for use in war.
(11) Barbed wire and implements for fixing and cutting the same.
(12) Horseshoes and shoeing materials.
(13) Harness and saddlery.
(14) Field glasses, telescopes, chronometers, and all kinds of nautical instruments.

It is to be understood that each belligerent has the power to declare additional articles susceptible of use in war as well as for the purposes of peace to be conditional contraband.

The declaration of London further provides that the following may not be declared contraband of war:

(1) Raw cotton, wool, silk, jute, flax, hemp, and other raw materials of the textile industries, and yarns of the same.
(2) Oil seeds and nuts; copra.
(3) Rubber, resin, gums, and lacs; hops.
(4) Raw hides and horns, bones, and ivory.
(5) Natural and artificial manures, including nitrates and phosphates for agricultural purposes.
(6) Metallic ores.
(7) Earths, clays, lime, chalk; stone, including marble, bricks, slates, and tiles.
(8) Chinaware and glass.
(9) Paper and paper-making materials.
(10) Soap, paint and colors, including articles exclusively used in their manufacture, and varnish.

(11) Bleaching powder, soda, ash, caustic soda, salt, cake, ammonia, sulphate of ammonia, and sulphate of copper.
(12) Agricultural, mining, textile, and printing machinery.
(13) Precious and semiprecious stones, pearls, mother-of-pearl, and coral.
(14) Clocks and watches, other than chronometers.
(15) Fashion and fancy goods
(16) Feathers of all kinds, hairs, and bristles.
(17) Articles of household furniture and decoration; office furniture and requisites.

It will be noted how small is the list of those things which we desire to export that is not contraband of war. Cotton is the only important item on the list. All the other articles figure lightly in our exportations.

On the other hand, nearly all the articles which we desire to sell abroad are in the contraband list. Foodstuffs and grain, clothing and manufactured articles, horses, automobiles, machinery—all these are contraband.

When the advocates of this bill say it is not intended to cover contraband of war they are, to say the least, disingenuous. If they had been perfectly frank and candid they would have told the House that if it did not cover contraband goods it would be of little value or that it was intended only to benefit the South in shipping its cotton.

But if it was not intended to carry contraband goods the bill should so provide. I shall introduce an amendment limiting the operation of the bill to goods not contraband of war. This will test the sincerity of those who have assured us that it is not intended to cover contraband goods.

NOT NEEDED TO MOVE GRAIN.

The plea of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that ships are waiting at our ports to carry our grain abroad and are only delaying until the Government will insure them is entirely unfounded. There are ships waiting, but they are not our ships; they are the ships of France and England and other nations. They are not waiting for the passage of this bill, for this bill would not help them in the slightest degree. This bill does not propose to insure foreign ships, but only American ships. It is mere pretense to carry the idea that this bill will help the farmers sell their grain.

There are abundant ships ready and anxious to carry all the products Americans can sell abroad, and as soon as exchange and payment can be arranged there will be no difficulty in finding ships.

For the United States to carry this war-risk insurance will not facilitate the movement of grain. The grain will be carried in English or French vessels and the war risk will be carried by the respective Governments if it is consigned to their ports. If it is consigned to neutral ports outside the war zones, no war-risk insurance will be needed or taken. It is a safe proposition to leave the carrying of contraband goods to the vessels of those countries which desire the goods. We can afford to forego the carriage if we sell the goods. It is also safe to assume that if England and France desire our food products as long as they control the Atlantic and have the ships they will carry them. And as long as they control the seas we could not send our goods to Germany and Austria if we desired.

There is a great difference in its international aspects between a citizen selling to a belligerent and between a nation selling or aiding in the sale to a belligerent. While it can not be considered as a violation of neutrality for a citizen of a neutral power to sell to a belligerent, any act by which a neutral nation as such aids, assists, or in any way helps the cause of the belligerents must be regarded as an unfriendly act.

NEUTRALITY.

A neutral nation is one which wholly abstains from taking part in an existing war and renders no aid or service to either of the belligerent powers. We are friendly to all the European powers now at war. It is our duty not to take any part in the struggle and not to aid or help any of the warring nations. But that does not mean we are to stop all intercourse and trade with them. Neutrality does not imply that and the nations do not expect it. Our citizens may sell anything they desire to any or all of the belligerents. They may sell contraband of war, even arms and ammunition, if they take the chances of delivery and payment. Although most of the warring powers have declared grain and foodstuffs contraband of war, our people may freely sell their grain and products to any purchaser who will buy and pay for them.

But while individual citizens may do these things, the Government must not do them. International law declares:

If a neutral state, in its corporate capacity, were to engage in contraband trade, it would be regarded as an act of hostility by the injured state and would result in a declaration of war. An individual engaging in such trade does so at the risk of losing his goods by capture and confiscation. He does not, however, involve his Government in the breach of neutrality of which he is himself guilty.

If American citizens shall sell contraband products to a belligerent power, no notice of the transaction will be taken by any nation. But if our Government makes or aids such sale it will be deemed a hostile act. To insure a cargo from loss by war is to induce the shipment—is to aid in making the sale. It will be justly considered an unfriendly act by the nations opposing. There will be little chance of escaping a direct involvement if we are guilty of such a distinct breach of neutrality.

DANGERS WE INCUR.

It is quite likely gentlemen who support this bill do not realize the hazardous enterprise in which they ask the Government to embark. In the first place, we are asked to put $5,000,000 of the people's money in an enterprise so doubtful and dangerous that private capital will not take the risk. Still more unwise is it for the Nation to take the desperate chance of helping one of the contestants without offending the other.

It is useless to disguise the fact that the passage of this bill will aid England, France, and Belgium at the expense of Germany and Austria. The former control the seas and will not interfere with cargoes that will help them. Their ports are nearest us and open to our ships. To give them food and clothing will be to aid them in their great struggle with Germany and Austria. But what of those great powers? They are our friends as well as Great Britain, France, and Belgium. They will have a just grievance against us. We thus may forfeit for a little gain the permanent friendship of two great nations. This we can not afford to do.

If we shall send over American-owned ships into the danger zones carrying contraband goods consigned to a belligerent port with our guaranty as a Nation against loss, what will occur? They will be stopped and searched on the high seas by the war vessels of some of the belligerent powers. If it is found that the cargo is consigned to a port of the nation to which the war vessel belongs, or to a port of one of its allies, then it is probable the ship will be allowed to continue its voyage. But in such case the nation against which the warship is battling will have a right to regard the Government-guaranteed shipment to their enemy as an unfriendly act.

If, however, the shipment be consigned to an enemy's port or to a neutral port and it was supposed the shipment had an ulterior hostile destination, the warship would not allow the vessel to proceed, and might even destroy both vessel and cargo. This would be visiting a direct loss and injury to the Government of the United States, which had insured them. If any untoward incident occurs, if any indignity to the crew be shown, if anything that could be construed as an insult to our flag should happen, then at once we are at war.

It will be noted that the danger is not confined to cargoes destined for belligerent ports. It exists as well with regard to cargoes consigned to neutral ports. Vessels may be loaded with grain or foodstuffs to Holland ports, which are neutral. But Holland ports at the mouth of the Rhine could send this grain or foodstuffs directly to the military bases of the German armies. It is a proposition of international law that cargoes of contraband articles consigned to neutral ports but destined to be from thence transferred to a belligerent are subject to seizure and confiscation. An American vessel thus laden could be stopped on the high sea, searched, and if it was thought the cargo had an ulterior hostile destination, the cargo and even the vessel itself could be destroyed.

We will be fortunate at best if during this terrible struggle we can prevent being drawn into it. More than half the world and all the great nations are involved. The warfare is on every grand division of the earth's surface except our own. It is on every sea. The thunders of its guns can be heard even on our own shores. We can hardly imagine an activity, financial or commercial, but reaches into and is affected by this conflict. It will be remembered how even a fancied insult to our flag at Vera Cruz brought us to the brink of war. It should be understood that when passions are inflamed until the war spirit dominates every faculty and for the time utterly destroys reason men will not, can not, act with prudence. If the subjects of one of the warring powers should capture an American vessel on the high seas, carrying what they, even upon insufficient evidence, considered contraband of war, it would not be at all unlikely they would commit some act that would arouse national resentment.

We can not afford such risks. We can not take such chances.

OUR DUTY AS A NATION.

The President wisely and in good form issued a proclamation of neutrality in which he urged upon all citizens of the United States "the duty of an impartial neutrality during the existence of the conflict."

Again, the President in an impressive address to the Nation said:

Every man who really loves America will act and speak in the true spirit of neutrality, which is the spirit of impartiality and fairness and friendliness to all concerned.

Again, he said:

The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action; must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.

These are golden words. They were made in the spirit of the highest patriotism and the largest humanity. They are worthy of the best traditions of the high office which the President holds.

If that spirit shall pervade Congress, this bill will never be passed. If it is the duty of citizens of the United States to maintain an attitude of "impartial neutrality during the existence of the conflict," how much more is it the duty of the Government itself to do so. If it is the duty of "every man" to act and speak "in the true spirit of neutrality," how much greater is the obligation of the Nation itself to do so. If the United States "must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls," if it must put a curb upon "every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another," it will not become a guarantor of the delivery of contraband goods to a belligerent power.

There is no doubt about what the people of the United States desire. They desire that the United States should keep out of the struggle at any cost, at any sacrifice less than that of our integrity and our honor. They also desire and pray that this cruel war shall quickly end. If we shall act with regard to those desires, we shall defeat this bill. To pass it is to invite our own entanglement. And if we shall hope to ever exercise our good offices to bring to an end this awful era of carnage and of death, we must so hold ourselves from even the appearance of partiality that no one of the nations involved can have reason to doubt our friendship.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield some time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I have noticed what I thought to be a slight confusion on the part of some of those who have spoken on this question with regard to the plain provisions of the bill. Under the title and under the various paragraphs of the bill it will provide for the insurance only of American vessels and their cargoes against nothing but the risks of war. What are the risks of war incurred by a neutral merchant ship? A neutral vessel is not subject to capture unless she is carrying contraband of war or attempting to get into or out of a blockaded port or performing an unneutral service for one of the belligerents. Now, we are assured by the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill that it is not intended to insure contraband goods nor vessels attempting to violate a blockade, and it is not intended to insure vessels that will engage in unneutral service. What war risk is there left that can be covered by this bill? Well, if there were American goods on board a foreign vessel—a belligerent subject to capture—even such goods would be in little danger, for neutral goods are not subject to confiscation; they might, however, be misbandled in loading or unloading from the captured vessel and injured in that way, and there would thus be some war risk on American goods in foreign bottoms, but this bill would not cover that risk. It proposes to insure only American vessels and their cargoes. There is, however, one risk that I have not mentioned. If our vessels are damaged by floating torpedoes, that, of course, is one war risk that might be covered by such a bill as this. But aside from some such almost accidental danger there is very little war risk to be covered by this bill, according to the declarations made by its supporters on the floor of the House.

One very great risk remains, though, which I think has not been mentioned either by the supporters of the measure or by its opponents. In this, we may suspect, is the very essence of this bill; that is, the risk to ships whose registration is of doubtful validity. This bill belongs with the act that was passed a few days ago. No American capitalist has been willing to purchase foreign-built vessels under the terms of that act, which provides for the transfer of foreign vessels to the American flag, because in such a transaction there is a very big war risk. Under the continental system of international law, as distinguished from the Anglo-American system, the transfer of vessels from enemy ownership to neutral ownership after war breaks out furnishes so strong a presumption of fraud in the neutral registry that the vessels are captured and are taken to the prize court, where they are usually condemned. In order to make it safe for American capitalists to buy and transfer to American registry foreign-built ships, some such bill may be necessary, but there is no other war risk except the pure accident of running into a floating mine or some such thing, that can be covered by it. Our vessels carrying contraband goods will be subject to capture, but we are told that this will not apply to contraband. The bill does not say so, but the information comes to us on the floor of the House that contraband will not be insured. Now, as to the officers and crews of vessels recently transferred to American registry, they may be the same men that sailed her when she carried the flag of a belligerent power. Such men, still controlled by their sympathy and loyalty to the flag of their allegiance, might perform an unneutral service. Is it desirable to pass a bill that will cover such a risk as that?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If the insurance is placed through insurance companies——

Mr. TEMPLE. The association of marine companies have announced that their rates on contraband goods will be high. Our information is that the Government will not accept any contraband goods, which relieves us from that danger.

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to ask if all the insurance is placed through insurance companies, how will we be able to stop the shipping of goods to belligerent ports?

Mr. TEMPLE. Great Britain, in operating Government war-risk insurance, reserves the right to forbid any particular voyage, and I presume the rights of the Government under this bill will be the same. I take it for granted that the conduct of officers in charge of the bureau of war-risk insurance created by this bill would be guided by ordinary common sense; but at best the new registration bill, in combination with this one, will involve us in a dangerous undertaking. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 12 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will not the gentleman from Georgia use some of his time?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is our intention to have but one speech in conclusion.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I view this bill, it is fraught with the gravest danger to this Nation. I fear it will involve us ultimately in the European war. My devout wish is to keep aloof from any such entanglements. This bill is intimately connected with the ship registry bill. It is virtually its sequel. The principle is now recognized in international law, and our Government agreed to it in the international naval conference of London in 1909, that no Government or person can purchase any merchant vessel of a belligerent after war begins unless it is for the purpose of being used on an entirely different route and the control in ownership has completely changed. No mere colorable transfer of title will protect the vessel on an attempted change of nationality.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like the gentleman's authority for that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have in my hand a report of that conference to which our Government was a party, which reads as follows:

ARTICLE 56.

The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was vetoed by the English Government before it was ever adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Our Government committed itself to this principle and the signatory powers submitted this rule with others for the guidance of the international prize court that was to be established pursuant to the recommendation of the second Hague conference.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The Italian Government in its war with Turkey adopted this as its policy in spite of the fact that it had not been ratified by all the powers, and Great Britain and France have announced that they intended to act on the declaration of London although not ratified.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been accepted generally as international law since the London conference that you can not transfer a belligerent vessel to a neutral flag after the outbreak of hostilities. Prior to that conference the principle was not universally accepted, our Government having assumed a contrary position. This insurance bill is designed to throw a mantle of protection around vessels that are about to be purchased, and the principles of international law are opposed to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to see the gentlemen state in the RECORD as an accepted principle of international law something that was never considered in international law until the very convention he refers to, and that was vetoed by the British Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman, I fear, is mistaken; Great Britain may not have ratified it, but it did not veto it. The British Government, nor any of the various signatory powers of which the United States was one, made no reservation or exception to the full acceptance of this principle, as was the case with some other principles before the conference, but it was enunciated as the accepted principle for future guidance.

Mr. TEMPLE. In the declaration and report adopted by the conference at London they declared that they adopted this as the generally accepted principle of international law, with regard to which there is some variety of practice in the application of it. They are the generally accepted principles of law.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are accepted even by Great Britain. As to the rule of international law before this conference, I wish to read from Hall's International Law, page 505, an accepted authority, where he says:

> Vessels, according to the practice of France and apparently of some other States, are, however, excepted on the ground of the difficulty of preventing fraud. Their sale is forbidden, and they are declared good prize in all cases in which they have been transferred to neutrals after the buyers could have knowledge of the outbreak of a war.

And in a note he says:

> The sale of a vessel, to be good, must be proved by authentic instruments anterior to the commencement of hostilities, and must be registered by a public officer. The practice dates back to 1694.

Continuing in the text, he says:

> In England and the United States, on the contrary, the right to purchase vessels is in principle admitted, they being in themselves legitimate objects of trade as fully as any other kind of merchandise, but the opportunities of fraud being great the circumstances attending a sale are severely scrutinized, and a transfer is not held to be good if it is subjected to any condition or even tacit understanding by which the vendor keeps an interest in the vessel or its profits, a control over it, a power of revocation, or a right to its restoration at the conclusion of the war.

Even admitting that the rule is not generally accepted, as I contend, that belligerent merchant vessels can not change their nationality to a neutral flag after the beginning of hostilities, it must be conceded that it is of sufficient doubt to make any such transaction questionable, and if our Government was concerned as a party it would perhaps involve us in the transaction and the dispute.

Owners of vessels flying belligerent flags to-day are naturally desirous of changing their registry to our flag if they can gain the protection of our Government for the war risk by having our Government insure them.

The purpose of this war-risk insurance bill is to impose on the Government that risk which private insurance companies refuse to take, except at very high compensatory rates. There is no need, so far as bona fide American ships are concerned, carrying noncontraband articles, whether sailing for South American ports or even to European ports, of any war risk, because there is none. They are neutral ships engaged in a proper commerce, and there is no additional risk by reason of the war. There is no war risk even as to American articles of noncontraband character when carried in an enemy's ships. It is true that those ships may be captured by an opposing belligerent power, but the neutral goods would not be liable to capture. Here is the danger of this whole thing about which we should hesitate before we plunge into this project:

Suppose the Government does insure these vessels that are of doubtful registry, and the war vessel of a foreign belligerent power would search the ship, as it has the right, and questions the nationality of the ship and the bona fides of the transfer, and holds it as a prize. Immediately this country is thrown into an uproar; feelings are aroused to a fever heat as to whether the foreign Government has that right. All this country would be immediately stirred to its depths, and it would be very difficult for us, indeed, to stem the passions that would be generated by such an act of seizure or even of search. They have the right of search. Why, then, should the Government interfere by this dubious practice when there is no need whatsoever? We can send in bona fide American vessels to any port those goods that are not contraband. Shall we adopt the policy that we should insure those vessels of dubious character, whose nationality is questioned, or those goods carried in those vessels which are contraband, merely to throw the protecting arm of the Government around it, and thus involve the Government in those difficulties? It has been argued that Great Britain and Belgium and France have Government war insurance. That is a different case entirely. They are to-day involved in war, and they have real war risks. All their merchant vessels and the merchandise of their merchants are liable to seizure and confiscation. We are a neutral power, and have everything to gain if we but keep cool and keep inviolate our obligations as a neutral. We have no war risks to-day, unless we launch into questionable practices and assume them. I do not want our Government to do anything that will involve us in war or which will bring us to the verge of war. Why should we do this? Why should we be precipitate? Where has the showing been made that we should undertake this very questionable practice?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that the war risks covered by Great Britain and France are upon contraband goods that are for their own uses?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the very purpose of the insurance as provided by Great Britain and France to cover war risks on contraband articles, and it is not the policy of this country to launch into that kind of business, for our merchants as private citizens, nor our Government as a party by insurance, should not attempt to engage in contraband commerce. Those goods that are not contraband will be carried in American vessels, or in foreign vessels, and without liability of capture in either case. Where is the showing that has been made that we as a Government should undertake this practice, which may involve us in danger at the very time when we should do all that we can to keep out of the European imbroglio?

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Do not these other nations intend to protect the risk that they take by their own fleets?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the bill drawn here would go to the extent of protecting these vessels when engaged in other than commerce with the United States. It would involve protecting them on their return voyage, even in case the cargo should happen to go to China. It is not certain that the transit will be merely between our country and the belligerent powers and back to this country. That is not the way these tramp vessels are chartered. They are chartered for different cargoes, and may go around the world. I think it is the policy of wisdom not to rush pell-mell into this line of activity, but to leave it to the private insurance companies. The war is barely three weeks old, and there is no such exigency confronting this Nation for us to adopt a policy that spells, I fear, loss, embarrassment, entanglements, perhaps war. Let us, even to our own commercial disadvantage, keep aloof from any practices that may even tend toward involving us in war. I wish to shun and avoid any such calamitous condition.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I promised to grant time to two other gentlemen who do not seem to be present.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota permit me to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I yield further to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question that might have been put to other Members, but I am quite sure the gentleman can answer it, and that is whether as a matter of fact the leading beneficiaries of this insurance that we are now going to offer with the people's money would not be those great concerns heretofore doing business in foreign bottoms that have announced, since the passage of the registry bill, that they would transfer their registry from the foreign to the American flag?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is generally accepted that some of the beneficiaries of this governmental insurance proposition would be the Standard Oil Co., the United Fruit Co., and the United States Steel Corporation, which have a large number of steamers flying foreign flags at the present time, and now see it is to their advantage to turn the vessels over to American registry.

Mr. MOORE. Since this is called an emergency measure, does not the gentleman think it will be very interesting to our Democratic friends who have not heard the discussion, particularly the address of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], to know we are actually staking $5,000,000 of the people's money out of the Treasury of the United States against risks in a hazardous business undertaken and chiefly carried on by three of the greatest corporations in the United States?

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not only staking $5,000,000 but we are staking the very security of this Government, and I think we should be very slow on going ahead with such a proposition. This is not a partisan question. I am viewing it from the standpoint of my duty as a patriotic American.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not there a less risk of having a war if we should adjourn and go home and quit talking? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: My information is if these companies should transfer their vessels to the American flag, they will continue to perform the same business they are now; so they would simply get the advantage of this insurance and render no aid whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. My greatest opposition to this measure is that I fear it will lead us into war, and I want to do everything possible to keep out. I am not considering so much the money side of the proposition as I am considering the national side of keeping our Government aloof from a foreign war.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have no other speaker, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain documents.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota and all who have addressed the committee have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all who have addressed——

Mr. ADAMSON. The request not only applies to those who have but those who may address the committee.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The committee can not very well grant that permission, although I would not raise any objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. The committee can not grant general permission to print, but it can grant permission to all who addressed the committee on a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have or who do address the committee upon this bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Would that apply to those who discussed the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I would like to have permission to extend my remarks on the discussion of the rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will include those who spoke on the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have addressed the committee upon the pending bill and all those who address the House upon the rule providing for the consideration of the pending bill may have unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the committee power to allow gentlemen who have addressed the House on the rule to extend their remarks?

Mr. TEMPLE. That is the parliamentary inquiry I also desired to make.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it has, Mr. Chairman, and I withdraw that amendment to the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws that part of his request and asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who addressed the committee upon the pending bill shall have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. ADAMSON. Or who do address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Or who do address the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, if the gentleman from Minnesota desires to recognize some one——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think my time is about exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has seven minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

[Mr. JOHNSON of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has six minutes remaining.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then I reserve the balance of my time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desired that time, but he does not seem to be here at this moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITZHENRY].

[Mr. FITZHENRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the Government of the United States is going into a very unnecessary and a very hazardous enterprise. Anyone who has ever been associated with insurance companies or with surety companies—and I have been associated with one of the latter—will understand just exactly what the Government is going into if this bill passes. First of all, a company is not to be organized as one usually is, by asking gentlemen who have the means to make an investment and take stock in order that the capital of the company may be provided, but at one fell swoop, right out of the Treasury of the United States, out of those funds which we have so often proclaimed our desire to safeguard, we are to take $5,000,000 and stake it against the risk and perils of war upon the high seas.

We are still settling the French spoliation claims that arose 100 years ago. We are still settling claims that have resulted from every one of our own wars, and it seems needless to now involve the Treasury of the United States in this new business enterprise, with its dangerous possibilities.

I think if this whole matter were submitted to a referendum, to the man back upon the farm or the man who owns the two-story house, and they had an opportunity to clearly understand it, there would be a unanimous and overwhelming verdict against the Government taking this step. Whose money are we dedicating to this risk? Whose money are we taking directly out of the Treasury for the benefit of private individuals who are putting their business upon the high seas? We are taking the taxpayers' money; we are taking the money raised by the tariff, the money raised by other methods, that ought to be applied to purposes in this country which sorely need it, and we are staking it in a game of chance; against the risk of running upon a foreign mine or of having American commerce seized because a daring captain has placed upon a ship goods that are contraband. We are inviting trouble and claims that might operate against this country for years. Indeed, we are staking the people's money against all sorts of unforeseen conditions, and we are doing it without giving the people a chance to know for whom it is being done.

Sixty-two gentlemen who came down from New York City, we are told, asked for this measure. They were headed by one gentleman whose name is well known in all civic movements, and those 62 gentlemen, possibly from Wall Street, which we heard so berated in this House only a few months ago, had sufficient influence with the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States to induce the great Democratic Party to reverse itself as the special champion of the people and take the people's money, which they boasted they were best able to protect, and risk it against the most hazardous business in which men can engage. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Has the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] exhausted his time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I can only say this, that I voted against the bill that was passed here a week or two ago opening up the registry to ships to be bought hereafter by Americans after a war had been declared which involved all Europe. I voted against that because I thought the tendency was to entangle us in that war. I have not changed my mind. Now this bill follows, providing for insurance by the United States of American vessels, the very vessels that could be bought after war was commenced, and registered under the American flag, under some sort of pretense and fraud, and guaranteeing, as it were, the title of those vessels and the legality of those vessels flying the American flag. I can not go to that extent. It is not necessary. There are vessels enough now to carry all the crops, including your cotton crop, the foundation of all this agitation. The cotton crop is to be cared for first; provision is to be made to float that; and then they added in another place, what? Naval stores and tobacco. I am unwilling, as much as I love my southern brethren, to chance war with all Europe or half of Europe for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of your crops to the market of the world. And for these reasons—I wish I had more time to state them, and I may take advantage of the permission to extend remarks in the RECORD—I am opposed to this bill and shall cheerfully vote against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-six minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield that time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD Mr. Chairman, I am always glad that I belong to a party that is ready to face an emergency that confronts this Government. I do not believe in "little Americans." I believe in those men who are broad-gauged Americans, who are willing to face every issue—commercial, moral, or political—that confronts the country and attempt to decide it aright in the interests of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This question is no idle dream, to be scoffed at or played with. For more than a week American ships, laden with American cargoes, have been in our ports, flying the American flag, prepared to carry the commerce of this country beyond the seas, and have been unable to sail because they could not get the insurance which the men who own the cargoes or who finance the cargoes demanded before the ships left our ports. Days ago unanimous consent was asked in this House for the consideration of this bill, and objection came from the leader of the minority party, clearly, from what I have heard to-day, voicing the un-American sentiments of his own party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This emergency confronts the country. The Republican Party is not responsible. The country has placed the responsibility in the hands of the Democratic Party to take care of this Government and its people. We would be glad to have the gentlemen on that side cooperate with us in this emergency, if they desired to do so. I am glad that I belong to a party that is ready and willing to face the emergencies that confront the country and to relieve its embarrassments, both to its commerce and its people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, what is this proposition? There is nothing that is very unusual about it. It is an effort to provide war insurance to American ships and American cargoes. There are no insurance companies abroad that are carrying the war risks of their own countries. The insurance societies of Great Britain to-day are carrying only 20 per cent of the war risks of that country, and 80 per cent of the war risks are carried by the Government of Great Britain. The same is true in a greater or less degree of the other countries of Europe; and it was only yesterday that I read the orders upon which the war risks of England are issued, and those war risks are issued only to their own ships and their own cargoes. So that if you do not pass this bill, you have no place to turn to insure your own ships and your own cargoes, except to a few American companies which, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has told you, say they have not the necessary capital and have not the commercial standing on which they can safely take this risk.

Do you want to force the people of your own country to assume insurance from companies that say themselves they have not the capital to safely grant that insurance? Other great Governments of the world are willing to take care of their people and their trade and their commerce in an emergency of this kind. Has the day come, even if our friends on the other side of the aisle are unwilling to rise to the necessities of this emergency, when the great Democratic Party, that has always been American, that has always stood for the interests of the American people, has not the courage to stand here and risk a few million dollars of the people's money in order that our crops, our cotton and corn and wheat, may go abroad and bring back gold to the people of the United States?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at this time.

Now, what does this insurance mean? A gentleman says that this bill does not intend to insure contraband of war, and surely he is right about it. It surely does not intend to insure contraband of war. But does that mean that some foreign ship captain may not say to an American captain, "Your cargo is contraband of war," whereas when it left the port it was not contraband of war? Suppose we load a ship that belongs to an American citizen with wheat destined for Stockholm, in Sweden, and as it goes through the North Sea a belligerent fires a shot across its bows and makes it come to, and says that wheat is contraband of war. Are not our cargo shippers entitled to insurance against it? Aye, more, whether they are insured or not?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not now.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman one or two questions. He has made some statements that are subject to dispute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that cargo is stopped and the cargo is not contraband of war, I want to know if there exists in this country still an un-American spirit of surrender that will not protect that American cargo or that American ship?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not yield. I am for peace, but I am for honorable peace. I believe that this country and every American citizen should do all that is in their power to protect the neutrality of this Government and our transactions. But I have not reached the point where I am unwilling to protect the rights of an American citizen and the American flag and American commerce in their rights on the high seas or at home. [Applause.]

Now, why do these men demand insurance? It is not to insure contraband of war, but it is to insure cargoes against the possible belligerent and unjustifiable act of a nation at war.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman pardon a suggestion? Ships have been sunk by floating mines.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. There are many war risks that may occur that are not involved in our carrying contraband of war or violating any of the acts of neutrality. You can not ship cargoes without insurance. Why? Because almost every man who ships a cargo must borrow the money. He either has a draft on a foreign country, or the middleman who has bought the cargo has borrowed the money until he gets it into the foreign port. The man who lends the money is not willing to lend it in a hazardous enterprise without he is insured against all risks.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend from Illinois is one of the most delightful gentlemen in this House, and I love to converse with him, but my time is limited now, and I desire to carry on our conversation at some other time.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is misleading the House so much——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not misleading the House. No man in this House knows better than the gentleman from Illinois—because he is a great business man—that business can not be done without insurance.

The question then comes, with no insurance that you can get abroad for war risks, with the insurance companies in this country saying that they have not the capital or the ability to carry these war risks: Must you say that the only way that your corn and your cotton and your wheat can go abroad and bring back gold to America is to carry them in a British vessel, sell them to a British merchant before they leave our port, as suggested by our friends on the other side, limit our sales to British merchants, because they are the only ships sailing the seas to-day which are in our ports; take their price for it, put it in their ships, and limit our commerce in that way? Why, there are neutral countries that will buy cotton and corn and wheat and our other exports. Must we limit our commerce merely to the demands of Great Britain because Great Britain owns the ships that can carry them on the seas? Must we say to the cotton farmer of the South and the wheat grower of the North that an American Congress is too cowardly to take care of their interests, and that when their wheat and their cotton go abroad they must take their insurance from the British Government at the high war-insurance rate of a belligerent power instead of the much lighter insurance that their own Government can guarantee to them in this way? It seems to me that there can be no question about it.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe in the Government of the United States engaging in business. I am one of those who would keep the Government of the United States as far removed from business as possible. I believe in giving a free and fair opportunity to all business men, as long as they conduct their business fairly and justly, to handle the business of this country and enjoy its profits. But there are days that come in the lives of all nations and all peoples when the ordinary rules of Government and the ordinary rules of commerce can not apply.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] tells you that we have plenty of ships to move this commerce; that what we need is somebody to buy our merchandise. Why, the gentleman from Minnesota is talking in the hour and not of the days to come. Everybody understands that to-day foreign exchanges are unsettled; that we can not afford to sell our goods abroad on exchange; that we must demand gold; but everybody knows that the great belligerent powers abroad must be fed by this country if this war lasts any length of time, or they will starve; and they must give their gold for food as well as for arms, and the day is not far distant when they will be compelled to do it. This difficulty of foreign exchange will rapidly be removed. It is not more than three weeks since this condition first arose. No one can predict how long this war will last. Let me call your attention to this fact: The gentleman says you have plenty of ships to carry your cargoes to Europe and other countries. If I recollect the figures aright—and I put them into the RECORD not many days ago—of the cargoes that were carried to Europe last year 86 per cent of American cargoes were carried in vessels of countries that are now engaged in this war. Less than 2 per cent were carried in American vessels, and only 14 per cent in the vessels of nonbelligerents.

Of course these nonbelligerent countries may have these ships diverted in other channels that are equally as profitable, if not more so. Norway has to carry her ships across the North Sea, with all the present dangers, and it may keep some ships at home.

But conceding that we have the full 14 per cent of nonbelligerent ships to carry cargoes to Europe at present, and that we get a reasonable proportion of Great Britain's ships—and Great Britain last year carried 51 per cent of our cargoes, while a great many have been diverted for war purposes—suppose we get half, which would be 25 per cent, added to the 14 or 15 per cent of nonbelligerents, and that gives you 40 per cent of last year's carrying capacity. You know that Germany and France and Austria practically have no merchant ships on the sea. There is 60 per cent of last year's carrying capacity of American commerce that has to be provided for. You have got to provide for it yourself if you want it to move. If you do not move it, you bring about one of the most calamitous conditions with which this country has ever been confronted. If you fail to sell your surplus wheat, cotton, and corn to the nations of the world that need it because you have not the ships or the insurance with which to do it, you bring a panic upon this country. On the other hand, if you are willing to stand up to your responsibilities, to face the issue and laugh to scorn the arguments such as we have listened to within the last half hour, that some of these ships that are to move the cargoes belong to the great corporations of this country, and therefore should be tabooed, and that we should not give them insurance in which to carry our constituents' goods, you will avert that calamity. I am thankful to say that I do not believe that those arguments will appeal to the reason of the men who hold allegiance to the great Democratic Party of this country. I believe, and have always believed, in building up the American merchant marine. I believe it is just as great a folly for the country to run its business without ships to carry its commodities on the seas as it would be for a great department store to run its business without wagons to deliver its goods.

But that is not the sole question here. I am in hopes that the day is not distant when the American flag will be seen flying above an American merchant marine in every port of the civilized world. [Applause.] But that is not the question that confronts us to-day. Your people and my people are distressed. A condition of war with which they have had nothing to do has brought this distress upon them. It is your business and my business as their Representatives to stay here and remedy these conditions so far as the law of the land can remedy them, and the most important proposition that confronts them is the movement of their surplus crops across the seas of the world.

Now, as I said in the beginning, they can not get the war insurance from foreign countries because they will not grant it to other ships than their own. The gentlemen who appeal to you to defeat this bill come here and tell you that men who issue American insurance say they can not carry the risk themselves and that they must have help. They would have you believe that these men who are engaged in the insurance business in the United States are moved by no greater motive at this emergency in their country's history than the selfish motive of trying to create a monopoly for their own interest.

Do you believe it? Does anybody believe it? Where do they create any monopoly? The door is wide open to-day to organize as many insurance companies as you can get capital to organize. The fact is that American insurance companies that place commercial risks at sea have usually reinsured in foreign companies because they did not have the capital themselves to carry the risk, and although they might write a risk of half a million dollars in their own name their usual practice was to reinsure 60 per cent in foreign insurance companies, mostly in the insurance companies of Austria and Great Britain. And yet these gentlemen of un-American spirit would have you keep all doors closed to them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of war-risk insurance, the director and employees of which shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury; the salary of the director shall be $6,000 per annum, and the salaries of the other employees shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case to exceed $5,000 per annum for any employee: Provided, That all employees receiving a salary of $3,000 per annum or less shall be subject to the civil-service laws and regulations thereunder.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, that concludes the reading of the first section, as I understand it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there are some amendments that gentlemen desire to offer to-morrow, and I want it understood that this section is left open to amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is the wish of the gentleman, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If I can get the gentleman from Pennsylvania to agree not to make points of no quorum to-morrow——

Mr. BUTLER. I will make no promises.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, with prayerful requests to all brethren to be here in the morning, so as to deprive the gentleman of the pleasure of defeating 45 minutes of our time, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not a pleasure. It will be a pleasure to have you gentlemen attend to your duty and enforce the rule that you passed last Tuesday.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the understanding of the Chair that it will be in order to offer amendments to the first paragraph of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I understand.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair, and he will so hold. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWNING, indefinitely, on account of serious illness.

To Mr. VARE, on account of the illness of Mrs. Vare.

To Mr. STOUT, indefinitely, at the request of Mr. EVANS, on account of sickness.

To Mr. TAYLOR of New York, on account of the dangerous illness of his wife.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 29, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the commanding officer of Watertown Arsenal of "Tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes" made at that arsenal during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1390); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the president of the Civil Service Commission, submitting paragraph to be inserted in the next appropriation bill presented to the House for contingent expenses of the Civil Service Commission (H. Doc. No. 1156); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 29, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o' clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Bryan	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Burton	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Johnson	Nelson	Sterling
Chilton	Jones	Overman	Swanson
Clapp	Lane	Perkins	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Thornton
Culberson	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Cummins	McLean	Shields	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. TOWNSEND answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRADY, Mr. WALSH, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish to announce the continued absence of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate heretofore given and request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

I wish also to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. SHAFROTH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. My mind was attracted for the moment. I thought the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] was going to move an executive session. I understand the bill is now before the Senate and the amendment which is pending is the amendment I offered last evening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from Idaho, if he will yield to me, to make a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to yield to the program of the majority, whatever it is.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is thought best to go into executive session immediately.

Mr. BORAH. I yield, if the Senator desires to make the motion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT POCATELLO, IDAHO.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 4920) to increase the cost of construction of Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho. The building is in process of construction, and they have been waiting to see whether the increase requested by the Treasury Department would be allowed or not. The bill increases the cost from $100,000 to $125,000. The department recommends the increase, and the work is stopped pending the action of Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered. It is very important that the bill should be passed at once, as the work is stopped.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 681), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the erection and completion of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other governmental offices at Pocatello, Idaho, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost for said building from $100,000 to $125,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On yesterday the House of Representatives sent to the Senate the bill S. 136, commonly known as the seamen's bill, with an amendment. The bill and amendment were laid before the Senate, and on motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] the Senate disagreed to the House amendment, requested a conference with the House, and conferees on the part of the Senate were appointed by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. President, I was detained from the Senate on yesterday by illness, and this action was the usual one and it was entirely proper. It is, however, desired that the bill and amendment of the House be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I therefore enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House, and I move that the House be requested to return the bill and amendment to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator from Texas will withhold the motion until the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] returns. He had not finished last evening, and he is the only Senator I know of who intends to speak.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. If the Senator will yield, I will state that the Senator from Nebraska is on his way, and he will be here by the time the galleries are cleared and the doors closed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I had sent for him.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Certainly, there was no attempt to cut him off.

Mr. NORRIS entered the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 40 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea, the House amendment thereto, and the message of the Senate requesting a conference with the House thereon.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend an act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second-homestead and desert-land entries.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American who has intermarried with an alien, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) to correct error in H. R. 12045, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented petitions of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids and Lacota, and of the congregation of the Westminster Church, of Detroit, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch, International Union of Steam and Operating Engineers, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Pattern Makers' Association of Grand Rapids; the International Wood Carvers' Association, of Detroit; of Grand River Lodge, No. 265, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Grand Rapids; of Local Division No. 333, Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees of America, of Battle Creek; and of Wayne Lodge, No. 141, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Detroit, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of antitrust legislation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition signed by 15 citizens of Gorham, Me., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against a tax on cigars, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. NEWLANDS, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2321) to limit the effect of the regulation of interstate commerce between the States in goods, wares, and merchandise wholly or in part manufactured, mined, or produced by convict labor, or in any prison or reformatory, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 771) thereon.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE EXPORT COTTON TRADE.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and requested to direct our diplomatic representatives to confer with the various Governments to which they are accredited with a view to the development of all possible measures looking to the uninterrupted continuance during the present wars of our export cotton trade.

That the Secretary of State is also authorized and requested to confer with the Secretary of Commerce and with representatives of foreign Governments in Washington in order to secure their cooperation in the development of such measures and to report to Congress at the earliest practicable date the result of the efforts herein directed.

CONSUMPTION OF COTTONSEED MEAL.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 33), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas about 500,000 tons of cottonseed meal and cake have heretofore been annually exported from the United States; and

Whereas by reason of war conditions this surplus is without a market abroad, the surplus equaling about one-third of the total output; and

Whereas the dumping of this surplus on existing domestic markets will depress the price of this article both as to raw material and finished product to such an extent as to cause disastrous losses to farmers producing the raw material: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby authorized and requested immediately to investigate the possibility of wider domestic markets for these products, especially in the northwest, northern, and northeast sections of the United States, and to report to Congress at the earliest practicable date a plan for acquainting these sections with the value and availability of these products as a feed for domestic animals, and for the marketing in these sections of the surplus of these products heretofore exported.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea, together with the amendment of the House and the message of the Senate requesting a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, returned to the Senate in compliance with its request.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House and appointed conferees thereon.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move that the bill and amendment of the House thereto be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the unfinished business be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to modify slightly the amendment which I offered last evening to section 22, upon page 31, and I will state the modification.

The amendment as now offered is to strike out, after the word "justice," in line 7, page 31, the following words:

Nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States,

So that the section will read:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, but the same, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act, may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

Mr. President, the effect of this amendment is to provide for jury trials in contempt cases in actions brought by the Government the same as when actions are brought by private individuals; and the effect of it will be to leave all contempt cases triable by juries where a crime has been committed, or where the act done would constitute a crime under the laws of the United States or the laws of the State in which the act was committed. It has the effect of eliminating the exception with reference to Government cases.

I want the Senate to know precisely what we are voting on before we do vote, although I presume most of the Senators, as they are absent, will have to take for granted what we are voting on.

Section 19 provides as follows:

That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

The Senate will observe that the instances in which the party is entitled to a trial by jury are instances in which the acts committed involve a crime. The objection which I had to that was that section 22 excepted from the operation of section 19 all cases in which the Government might be a party plaintiff, and, as the Government would be a party plaintiff in all suits under the trade commission act, and in a great many cases involving labor disputes as well, that we were practically making no change so far as the great mass of these cases was concerned, and in addition to that we were clearly discriminating against a class of citizens by reason of the fact that the trade commission bill confessedly would operate almost entirely against one class of citizens.

Upon the amendment I ask for a vote by the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I understood the Senator from Idaho to state that if that provision remained in the bill, and questions of the violation of orders made by the court in confirmation of orders made by the trade commission were submitted to a jury for determination, it would result in the immediate repeal of the trade commission bill.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator understood me to say that?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean on yesterday afternoon?

Mr. WALSH. As I recall, day before yesterday.

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not say that. I said that in my judgment it would lead to a reconsideration of that measure, and I assumed that for the reason that the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee seemed to think the sole virtue of that bill, so far as its enforcement was concerned, arose out of the fact that these men could be gathered up and fined by the court without the delay of a jury trial.

Mr. WALSH. I will state that I understood the Senator to say that if the trust magnates, against whom the orders went, were awarded a trial by jury as to whether or not they had violated the order of the court confirmatory of the order of the commission, it would result in the repeal of the trade commission law.

Mr. BORAH. No; although I would be very glad myself to see the trade commission bill repealed. I am opposed to it now, and I expect to be opposed to it so long as I retain my right mind; but what I said was this: I do not know the exact language I used, but this was the purport of my remark:

The Senator in charge of the trade commission bill relied upon the effectiveness of the trial by court in contempt cases to make that law particularly efficient, and I said that in my judgment if we undertook to give the business men of this country a trial by jury it would lead to a reconsideration of that bill. This bill will affect all classes of business men.

Mr. WALSH. Then I simply desire to inquire of the Senator from Idaho whether it is to that end that he now offers the amendment?

Mr. BORAH. No; Mr. President, it is not to that end that I offer it, but I should not have any objection at all if it had that effect. I have no hesitancy in saying that I am unalterably opposed to section 5 of the trade commission bill; but I am offering this amendment because I thoroughly agree with the very masterly argument of the Senator from Montana as to the right of trial by jury in these cases, and since the Senator has raised the question I submit to the Senator himself that the argument he advanced in favor of this proposition was an argument in favor of my amendment.

The Senator says:

> There is not an argument that can be advanced or thought of in opposition to trial by jury in contempt cases that is not equally an argument against the jury system as we now know it.

The Senator very properly puts it upon the broad ground of the right of the citizen to have his guilt or innocence determined by his peers, and the Senator will agree with me that the right can not be changed by reason of the fact that a particular party happens to be a plaintiff in one case and another party a plaintiff in another case.

The Senator further says in his argument:

> My own firm conviction is that a jury of citizens, selected in the manner provided by law, from among the citizens of the State, representing them in the performance of an important public duty, would not prove recreant. Their verdict would silence cavilling and strengthen in the minds of the people the conviction that the courts are indeed the dispensers of justice and not engines of oppression.

Whatever feeling I may have against the trade commission bill, I can say in all sincerity to the Senator that if there were no trade commission bill I should be in favor of this amendment. The fact that it may have a tendency to force a reconsideration of some of the provisions of the trade commission bill does not cause me to urge it with any less zeal, however.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am going to take this opportunity to say just a few words as to what this bill does with reference to taking away the power of the court to punish contempts.

The impression seems to be prevalent in the country that if the provisions of this bill are enacted into law it will take away practically all the power of the court to punish for contempts committed out of the presence of the court; and I have received a good many telegrams and letters stating that the parties sending these telegrams and letters were informed that this bill makes of the court solely an arbitrator in the matter of contempt. The discussion on the floor of the Senate also has proceeded very much along that line.

It seems to me we have taken the position of a sort of a legislative Don Quixote, fighting a big windmill. We have been discussing a proposition not in the bill at all. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday made a very powerful argument, and one with which I very largely agreed; and yet, if that address were published in the papers the people would have the right to assume that this bill practically places in the hands of a jury the decision of all matters of contempt. Of course, I know the Senator did not intend it to give that impression, but the argument he presented was very strong, and I think very clear and very convincing, to the effect that in practically all contempts committed away from the presence of the court it would be well to submit the question of the facts, at least, to the judgment of a jury, and that seems to be the impression the country has with reference to this legislation.

That impression has been given out by the newspapers, and I think the discussion here has probably warranted them in that conclusion, but, as a matter of fact, in the provisions of this bill we have not done anything of the kind. As a matter of fact we are doing very litle toward taking away the power of the court with reference to punishing contempts. We are taking very few cases and putting them in the hands of a jury to determine whether or not punishment for contempt shall be inflicted.

I simply wish to call attention to what the Senator from Idaho suggested a moment ago. I desire to emphasize how little we are doing in this direction, and correct, if I can, the prevailing impression as to the scope of this legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to suggest, as appropriate to the Senator's argument, that the exceptions are those which can be availed of by employer and employee alike.

Mr. JONES. Certainly. I do not think there is any particular discrimination. Some injustice might work out along the line suggested by the Senator from Idaho, I think, because of the character of other laws we have passed; but I can not see any class distinction in the provisions of this legislation.

But what have we done, what are we doing, with reference to placing in the hands of juries matters of contempt? Section 19 covers that point, and it simply provides what I shall read. It has been read several times; but I merely desire to emphasize it, and, if possible, to call the attention of the country and the business men who are very much disturbed over the idea that we are taking away from the courts the power to punish contempt the fact that we go just a very little way; that we are still leaving in the hands of the court the great mass of the power it now has to punish for contempt of its orders; and that the business interests need have no fears whatever from this legislation. If any criticism might justly be made, it would come from those who want legislation to go further along these lines.

Section 19 provides:

> That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia—
> Shall be tried by a jury only—
> If the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed.

So that before any person can be tried by a jury upon the charge of having violated a decree or order of the court, the act with which he is charged as being in contempt must be, in and of itself, a crime and contrary to some law of the United States, or the law of some State. This applies also only to orders of the district courts; contempts of orders of all other courts must be had as now.

That excepts, as the Senator from Idaho says, the great mass of contempts and charges of contempt; and as the bill now stands there is a further limitation even upon the right to have a trial by jury. It is contained in section 22, to which the Senator from Idaho has referred. In that section it is provided that if the alleged contempt, even though it may be a crime, even though it may be a violation of a law of the United States or some law of the State, is committed in a case in which the United States is a party, it is to be tried in the ordinary way, by the court itself. That further restricts the provision the committee has made for the trial of contempts by juries.

I do not see any real, substantial objection to the proposition made by the Senator from Idaho. If a man is entitled to be tried by a jury for a contempt which is a crime in a case between private parties, I can not see why even if the United States is a party, and he commits what is alleged to be a crime, a violation of a law, he should not then be entitled to his trial by jury. Why should the United States be given a preference over an ordinary citizen? If any, exception should be made in favor of the weak citizen rather than in favor of the powerful Government. With that provision we would not be going very far in providing for the ascertainment of the facts in these contempt cases by a jury. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho should be adopted.

Briefly, then, all that we are doing by the legislation proposed is simply to say that whenever a contempt is charged that is in itself a criminal act, a violation of a Federal statute or a State statute, in such case, and such case alone, shall the party be entitled to have the issue tried by a jury. All other instances of contempt, all other violations of court orders, must be tried according to the present procedure, by the court itself. As a matter of fact we are doing really nothing—we make a great show, we use lots of words and accomplish practically nothing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Secretary to state the amendment of the Senator from Idaho as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 31 of either print, beginning in the old print in line 7, after the word "justice" and the comma, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have for a long time believed that one of the misfortunes or obstacles confronting the courts in the administration of justice is found in the fact that the violation of an order of a court must be tried, or is ordinarily tried, at least, by the judge whose order or mandate has been disobeyed. I think there is great strength in the argument that by submitting the question of fact to a jury we relieve the court from the charge, so frequently made, that the judge who has been offended has sought to punish the man who offended him, and hence can not be impartial.

We had a striking illustration of that in my own State. The case was referred to by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in his very able exposition of the question of the right of trial by jury in contempt cases. I have ever since the decision mentioned been impressed with the fact that courts will not lose their real and proper power by submitting the question of fact in contempt proceedings to an impartial tribunal. In the case I refer to a very offensive and libelous editorial was written of the supreme court with reference to a case which was still before the court on a petition for rehearing. The attack was without justification. Our supreme court had always been held in the high respect to which it was justly entitled. A great wave of indignation against this editor followed the publication of his attack.

The supreme court, feeling that it must protect its dignity, summoned the editor before it for contempt and proceeded to inflict a very moderate penalty. At once the wave of indignation which had been created against the editor immediately changed into one of sympathy for him and against the court. It was said that a court that had been attacked was now engaged in using its great power to punish the very man with which it had a personal controversy. If the question of fact could have been submitted to an impartial tribunal, to some court and some jury other than the court that had been attacked, I have not the slightest doubt but that the editor would have received a very severe punishment and the court would have been saved from very great criticism.

I know of other cases somewhat similar. I am perfectly satisfied that if the questions of fact in all contempt cases, save where the contempt is committed in the immediate presence of the court or so near thereto as to be in effect in its presence, the juries will not fail to uphold the dignity of the court and the majesty of the law.

I believe that if it is right to submit questions involving the right of life to a jury it is not dangerous to submit to a jury a mere question of contempt. If we can safely repose in a jury the power to try all questions of property, all questions affecting the honor of the citizen, all questions affecting the liberty of the citizen—to a jury of 12 men—there is nothing unsafe in submitting to the same kind of a tribunal, summoned in the same way, the simple question of fact has this corporation or that individual violated the order of the court. I do not believe that such a procedure will result in lawlessness. I do not believe that it means disrespect for courts. I do not believe that it will drag down our courts. If I did so believe I would certainly not be found advocating the proposition, for I hold to this: The legislative branch of a government may make grievous errors, the Executive may even undertake the exercise of tyrannical power, but so long as the temple of justice stands open, as long as courts have the courage to declare the rights of the citizen as they are preserved in the law, and so long as a man has the right to be tried by a jury of his peers, no nation will ever be really enslaved.

So, Mr. President, I feel that it is safe, that it is proper, to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. I believe the dignity and authority of the courts will remain unimpaired. At the same time judges inclined to tyrannical practices or who are influenced by prejudice or passion will find a wholesome check has been placed upon unjust and arbitrary punishments.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think it proper now, while the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is under discussion, to just briefly call attention to an amendment which I myself propose to offer to the provision of the bill relating to jury trials in contempt cases. It seems very appropriate that I should do so in view of the general statements and arguments in regard to the trial of contempt cases by juries. I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the Senate in the discussion now. I had the indulgence of the Senate yesterday in discussing this proposition at some length, although not expecting to do so before entering into the discussion of the question.

It may be, Mr. President, that I am somewhat old-fashioned in this matter, that I have not kept up with this swiftly moving procession in regard to reforms in procedure, but I can not reconcile myself to the idea that this innovation in our practice is justified or warranted at all. I may stand alone in that position to-day, and I grant you, Mr. President, from some remarks recently made, and on this side of the Chamber, too, the prospect is not encouraging for this amendment of mine, which I think will do away with all the evils which can possibly arise out of prejudice on the part of the judge or the court who issued the order or decree, disobedience to which has brought on the contempt proceeding.

The amendment that I offer is this. After reciting the provisions in the bill, much as they are, with reference to trials for contempt, I provide further:

The written statement of the charge or charges having been furnished the accused as aforesaid, he shall thereupon be arraigned and his plea entered of record. If the accused should plead guilty to the charge, the court shall enter judgment thereon and impose sentence in the case. If he pleads not guilty, the court shall set the case for trial and admit the accused to bail until final determination of the case.

I would be glad if Senators would have the provision of this amendment in mind:

The trial shall be by the court, and witnesses called and examined for and against the accused as in criminal cases. If the accused shall be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly and the punishment prescribed. Said punishment may be by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That in cases where the fine is payable to the United States the same shall not exceed the sum of $1,000 in any case; and in no case shall the term of imprisonment exceed six months.

Now comes the important feature of the amendment, so far as it varies from the provisions of the bill:

If any person who has entered a plea of not guilty to a charge of indirect contempt shall make affidavit that the judge before whom the case is set for trial in the first instance is prejudiced against him and that on account of such prejudice he believes he can not have a fair and impartial trial, such judge shall designate forthwith some other judge to hear and determine the case.

Mr. President, if there is ground, as it seems to me, for trial by jury in contempt proceedings, it is on account of a fear of prejudice on the part of the judge whose order or decree has been disobeyed, and perhaps it is natural that there should be some fear of prejudice on the part of such judge. But, Mr. President, in comparison with the innumerable cases wherein judges who have issued orders have also heard the proceedings for contempt, the cases of abuse or of excessive fines or punishment are exceedingly rare. As I had occasion to say yesterday, it is hard to recall in modern practice or experience where there has been any great oppression on the part of the judge as against the party charged with contempt.

Mr. President, under this amendment the procedure in case the defendant fears that he may not have an impartial trial before the judge who issued the order is not confined to criminal cases alone or to acts involving a crime, but to all cases of indirect contempt, so that any person charged with an indirect contempt under the provision of this amendment, if he fears he can not have a fair and impartial hearing before the judge who issued the order or decree, can, upon an affidavit of prejudice, have another and an impartial judge called in forthwith to hear and determine the case.

I say, Mr. President, a provision like this will do away with the very foundation upon which is urged the claim that contempt cases should be tried by a jury, namely, the possible prejudice of the judge or the court who issued the order.

Furthermore, Mr. President, and briefly, too, we will have done away with the inconveniences in most cases of contempt of a jury trial and the delays occasioned thereby. We will have done away with a further and more important thing—the question of the constitutional power of Congress to require the trial of contempt cases by juries—for I think that under the great weight of authority the power to punish for contempt in disobeying the order of the court is a power inherent in the judicial power itself, and is necessary, in the last analysis, to the very existence of the court, as held in the Carter case. The trial by jury provided for by the Virginia Legislature was there held to be an invasion of this power of the court. In Oklahoma the statute providing for the trials of contempt by a jury has been held unconstitutional; and while, necessarily, the direct question has never been raised in our Federal courts, yet from the many decisions in regard to the inherent power of the court to punish for contempt and which goes along with the judicial power, it may be readily inferred that any provision like this for jury trial will be held unconstitutional.

Then, again, Mr. President, as I said yesterday, there is the grave question of public policy. I wish Senators would give consideration to that. I labor under no illusion, Mr. President and Senators, in regard to the origin, the foundation, of this proposed legislation. I know whence it springs. I know that it does not spring from labor, from the average laborer, from labor generally—"labor with its hundred hands that knock at the golden gates of the morning"—but it springs from the leaders elected, appointed, or self-constituted of labor unions. This is the origin of the desire for legislation of this kind.

In this connection I call attention to the question of public policy, as far as it is involved here.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator passes to the consideration of that, I desire to inquire of him whether he has investigated the question of the constitutional power to enact such legislation as is contemplated by his amendment, whereby the contempt of the order of one judge shall be heard and tried before another judge?

Mr. STERLING. I have not investigated it, except with reference to the one point—trial by jury—but it occurs to me, in answer to the Senator from Montana, that there can be no question there. It is not like calling in some other tribunal than a court to try the question of contempt. It remains as in the ordinary case of the prejudice of a trial judge and where under the law on an affidavit of prejudice another judge may be called in to try the case.

Mr. WALSH. Let me say to the Senator from South Dakota that the power has been very seriously and very frequently questioned. That is my recollection.

Mr. STERLING. But it was never held that the power did not exist.

Mr. WALSH. I think if the Senator will examine the reports of my State he will find it was so held.

Mr. STERLING. It has not been held not to exist in South Dakota, and I can hardly conceive of a reason why it should be held not to exist in a case of this kind.

So, referring again briefly to the question of policy, what will be the issue to be tried in a contempt case such as you may easily imagine would come before a Federal district court? A great strike is on and it is charged here is a combination in restraint of trade, in restraint of interstate commerce, and thousands are involved. Leaders are charged with disobedience to the order of the court enjoining certain actions of violence and of boycott. Will the issue be simply as to whether they committed the act? No; but under the latitude allowed or the latitude taken by counsel for the defense in a criminal case, the question likely to be tried before that jury will be as to whether that strike was justifiable or not. I think we should be delivered, our country wants to be delivered, from a proceeding or a situation of that kind and from the evil effects upon society and good government which might flow therefrom.

Mr. President, I believe the proposition for jury trial in this class of cases is dangerous in view of the conditions as they yet exist between combinations of labor and capital in this country, in view of the controversies which may arise between them, and in view, too, of further unreasonable and unwarranted distrust of the court which such legislation is likely to engender. In view of these considerations I think we ought not to make this dangerous innovation and by it depart as we shall from the practice and experience of the centuries in regard to the trial of contempt cases.

Oh, Mr. President, it seems to me that the tendency is here now in various phases of this legislation to go to an extreme. We can avoid that. We can yet have some of the good, wholesome progressive legislation provided for in the trade commission bill and in the antitrust bill now before us without venturing into the field of experiment altogether, and without enacting laws the constitutionality of which or the justice of which will be hereafter questioned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope that an amendment as important as this, an amendment as just as this, may receive proper consideration and a reasonable vote in the Senate of the United States.

I have my own convictions upon the law feature of the bill. That conviction, which I arrived at and which I expressed in the beginning of this discussion, has not changed in all the argument that has been produced. It is that that portion of the bill which takes away from the court the right, the privilege, to enforce its own decrees, without the interposition of a jury or any other body that can say, "No; this shall not be enforced," is not a constitutional provision.

I am satisfied that in some character of contempts the question might be submitted to a jury. The question whether the court was unduly abused and brought into contempt by declarations made by any person and any matter that does not go directly to the authority of the court itself to enforce its judgments may probably be left to a jury; but whenever a court has issued an injunction in conformity with its own jurisdiction and its power, I insist that whether the injunction can be stayed by any person or persons is not a question that can be submitted to a jury.

I disagree with my friend who offers this amendment in the assertion that the punishment by contempt has not very often been abused. I insist, Mr. President, that courts have grossly abused that power in the last few years, and I have called attention to a great many of them. I can call attention to one instance in a court where the offense grew out of a condition of this kind: One court had ordered a receiver not to do a certain thing. An appellate court had given instruction that he should do that thing. The first court said the interlocutory injunction was not appealable, and therefore the appellate court had no jurisdiction. The party affected by it submitted the matter to his own attorney, and refused to act one way or the other until he had the advice of that attorney. Within two hours the attorney gave him his advice. His advice was that the appellate court had no jurisdiction, but for his own safety he had better comply with the orders of that court. Within two hours he had complied with the orders of the court. He was brought up on contempt proceedings for obeying his counsel rather than the court for a couple of hours, and he was on two counts sentenced to six months each. In other words, he was sentenced a full year in the penitentiary for having waited until his counsel could advise him upon a proposition.

I am perfectly willing to say, Mr. President, that there has been a case tried not very far from here where there was a question as to the right and authority of labor unions. It was a mooted question. The parties were fighting it out, and because the order of the court was disobeyed for a length of time, until that matter could be settled, a year in the penitentiary was fixed. There is not any man with a sense of justice in his heart who would not say that that punishment under those conditions was an excessive punishment and an abuse, and a gross abuse, of the power that is held by courts in contempt cases.

But for those excesses, Mr. President, I would not deprive or attempt to deprive the court of its authority to enforce its own judgment. In the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] we have a right and we can exercise that right in an act limiting the punishment and seeing to it that no excessive punishment shall be given under the unrestrained power at present of a court to inflict punishment for contempt proceedings. The amendment, at least in my opinion, avoids entirely the question whether or not it is constitutional to grant to a jury the right to determine whether a court shall enforce its own process; but it also guards against the excessive use of the power conferred upon the courts, which, in my opinion, is clearly constitutional. I hope, Mr. President, that instead of going to the great extreme of depriving or attempting to deprive the court of its constitutional powers we shall limit the judgments that may be imposed, and that we shall take steps that will insure a fair trial, not by a prejudiced judge but by an unprejudiced court.

I think the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota ought to be adopted.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment pending is not the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, but the amendment which I offered, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the roll is called I wish to say that I am going to vote for this amendment. I am going to vote for it, not on the ground that I think the courts ought to be deprived of the power to enforce their own judgments, but as the bill now stands I am going to vote to equalize the right of American citizenship.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is detained from the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote, unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Unless I can transfer my pair, I shall have to withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which I transfer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to make the following announcement of pairs:

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JOHNSON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if no quorum has voted I am at liberty to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I vote "nay."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. It appearing that a quorum has not voted, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I am paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and have no right to vote except where it is necessary in order to make a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the announcement be made, Mr. President. We have been waiting a good while.

Mr. OWEN. If necessary to make a quorum I have a right to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is necessary for the Senator to vote in order to constitute a quorum.

Mr. OWEN. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 26, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 19 and section 20 down to and including the word "months." in line 6, on page 30, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute an indirect contempt or a contempt committed out of the presence of the court or of a judge at chambers, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 20. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, the person charged shall be given a written statement of the charge or charges against him, specifically setting forth the act or acts on which the charge of contempt is predicated: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and where the accused is a body corporate an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer. The written statement of the charge or charges having been furnished the accused as aforesaid, he shall thereupon be arraigned and his plea entered of record. If the accused should plead guilty to the charge the court shall enter judgment thereon and impose sentence in the case. If he pleads not guilty the court shall set the case for trial and admit the accused to bail until final determination of the case. The trial shall be by the court, and witnesses called and examined for and against the accused as in criminal cases. If the accused shall be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly and the punishment prescribed. Said punishment may be by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That in cases where the fine is payable to the United States the same shall not exceed the sum of $1,000 in any case; and in no case shall the term of imprisonment exceed six months.

If any person who has entered a plea of not guilty to a charge of indirect contempt shall make affidavit that the judge before whom the case is set for trial in the first instance is prejudiced against him and that on account of such prejudice he believes he can not have a fair and impartial trial, such judge shall designate forthwith some other judge to hear and determine the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the question is put on ordering the yeas and nays, I desire to say that I understand the Senator from South Dakota offers the amendment which has just been read not only because he is opposed to the policy of sections 19 and 20 but because he is fearful of the power of Congress to enact legislation of this character; and he offers the amendment to get rid of the constitutional difficulties. He proposes a change of judge. I suggested to him a while ago that he would not obviate the serious constitutional question by the substitute which he offers. I now call his attention to the following from the case of State against Judges, reported in Thirtieth Montana, at page 199:

While respectable authority may be found in support of the contention that it is beyond the legislative power to provide for a change of venue or change of judge in contempt proceedings, it is not now necessary to consider that matter. It is sufficient for this inquiry to say that the legislature did not do so in this instance.

I merely cite this to show that the power of Congress to legislate as contemplated in the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota is by no means free from doubt.

Mr. STERLING. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana cites no authority against it. I will venture the suggestion that the proposal contained in my amendment is not nearly so likely to be questioned as is the provision empowering a jury to try a contempt case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is necessarily absent by express permission of the Senate. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. On account of that pair I withhold my vote, but desire to be counted present. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], as on the previous vote, to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer, which announcement I wish to stand for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the previous roll call and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a pair with the Senator from Minnesota and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who is necessarily absent by reason of illness. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (after having voted in the negative). The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], to whom I transferred my pair, having come into the Chamber, I withdraw my vote, but if it is necessary to make a quorum, I will allow it to stand.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to inquire whether or not a quorum has voted?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, under the rules, how can the roll call be interrupted?

Mr. GALLINGER. It can not be.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to inquire whether a quorum has voted?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I renew the same point of order, that debate is not in order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will vote if necessary to make a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE. If my vote is necessary to make a quorum, I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I insist that any remarks made beyond a direct answer to the roll call are debate during the calling of the roll, and I therefore object.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I can be counted to make a quorum, I will not vote; otherwise I will vote. I ask the Chair as a parliamentary inquiry whether I will be counted to make a quorum if I do not vote?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that the result of the roll call be announced.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I insist that questions of that kind are perfectly legitimate even during a roll call.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I can not get an answer to my inquiry——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas are 8 and the nays are 40. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I vote "nay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas are 8 and the nays are 41. The amendment is lost.

The vote by yeas and nays, the result of which was announced by the Vice President, was as follows:

YEAS—8.

Burton	McCumber	Nelson	Smoot
Gallinger	McLean	Perkins	Sterling

NAYS—41.

Bankhead	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman	Swanson

So Mr. STERLING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest—and I am sure the Chair will sustain me—that the procedure would be much more orderly if the presiding officer would announce simply what the recapitulation shows, and then Senators can vote, if they desire to do so, to make a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the procedure the present occupant of the chair was trying to follow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly; but we have been interrupted three or four times during the roll call by Senators asking if a quorum had voted, and I think that is contrary to the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not constitute a decision, as the Chair understands, to say "the yeas are so many and the nays are so many."

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It must proceed further than that, and pending that Senators have a right to vote.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I offer as an amendment the amendment which has been printed and appears on page 3 of the printed amendments on Senators' desks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9a, page 17, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following:

That nothing in this section shall be held to take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several States under the laws thereof; and a judgment of conviction or acquittal on the merits under the laws of any State shall be a bar to any prosecution hereunder for the same act or acts.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I merely want to state to the Senate that this is strictly within the precedents and was drawn to cover a question which some Senator raised as to whether or not the enactment of section 9a would be held to confer on the United States exclusive jurisdiction of the subject thereof and would take away from the States the right to punish for embezzlement and larceny as therein defined. Under the case in One hundred and eighty-ninth United States, page 324, which I will not read, it was held by the Supreme Court that where the exception specified in the amendment was made the question would not arise. The amendment is in line with the precedents, and I hope it may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the other day I asked unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the committee amendment on line 12, page 11.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire as to whether the Senator refers to the reprinted bill or to the old bill?

Mr. CHILTON. I refer to the new bill, the reprint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will help the Secretary if the Senator from West Virginia can indicate the place in the old bill, because they have their notes based on the old bill and not the new one.

Mr. CHILTON. I will do that. It is page 10, line 20, of the original print. I asked unanimous consent the other day to insert in line 20, page 10, after the word "anything" and before the word "prohibited," the word "heretofore," so that that part of the section would read:

That nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws.

I take it that of course we did not mean, as the Senator will well understand, to make anything legal by this trust law when we have in fact made it illegal. The intention was to make the exception apply to the Sherman law; that is, something heretofore prohibited. But the Senator from Maryland, who at that time withheld his consent, called my attention to the fact that a still further amendment should be made if that should go in, and that the word "herein" in line 19 should be stricken out and the words "in this section" inserted.

I agree with the Senator that that is proper to make it perfectly clear. Therefore I move that on line 19 the word "herein" be stricken out and that there be inserted in lieu thereof the words "in this section," and that in line 20 the word "heretofore" be inserted before the word "prohibited," so that the paragraph will read:

That nothing in this section shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether, with the word "herein" stricken out and the words "in this section inserted," the bill would not then be open to the objection that other provisions of other sections might legalize something which had heretofore been made unlawful by the antitrust act?

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, no. The only thing about the word "herein" is that we make certain things lawful in this section. That refers to section 8, and it says:

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired.

Now, we do not want by this act to say that even though that right might have been acquired under the Sherman antitrust law we hereby legalize things which under that law would be illegal.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator is satisfied with it, I will accept his view.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; I am satisfied with it. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was adopted may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was adopted will be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, at the time section 8 was passed I indicated to the Senate that I should move to strike out the words "eliminate or," appearing in line 8 on page 9 of the new print, so that it would read, "where the effect of such acquisition is to substantially lessen competition," because if the competition is eliminated it is lessened. That is to say, that is also embraced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire where it is in the old bill?

Mr. CHILTON. It is on page 9, line 15, of the old bill. That is what the Senator is speaking of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 17, the Senator from Montana moves to strike out the words "eliminate or."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the old print I notice that the expression appears twice, once at the bottom of page 8, and again in lines 15 and 16 on page 9.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I intend to offer that amendment next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I likewise call attention to the fact that the concluding words of the paragraph, "or to create a monopoly of any line of trade," the word "commerce," being substituted for "trade," should be stricken out, because that is clearly already a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, section 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, in line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is a radical difference between the bill as reported by the committee and as it came from the House, which is found in the sentence now sought to be amended, in lines 10 and 11. In the bill as it came from the House the language was:

Or to create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community.

Mr. CHILTON. What is the Senator referring to now?

Mr. REED. The Walsh amendment, and I am referring to the print of August 28.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes—lines 10 and 11?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. I see.

Mr. REED. The committee for some reason struck out the word "trade" and the words "in any section or community" and substituted for those words the word "commerce," so that the section as reported, instead of reading "or to create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community," would read "to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the Senator's attention, as a member of the committee, to the fact that the word "trade" was stricken out and the word "commerce" included because the word "commerce" is defined by the first section of the bill and the word "trade" is not; and the words "in any section or community" were stricken out because of the fear that that was intended to apply to a local transaction and would be a regulation of intrastate commerce rather than interstate commerce, and therefore void.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the change of the word "trade" to the word "commerce" is very proper. I have no objection to that. The House bill distinctly aimed at the creation of a localized monopoly or a localized restraint, as distinguished from a general restraint or a general monopoly. If the bill is to stand as reported by the committee, then I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is all right; but my preference upon this section is very strongly in favor of retaining the phrase "in any section or community," because I believe we will be able in some instances to reach a condition which probably can not be reached under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I do not agree that the bill is susceptible of the construction suggested by the chairman, namely, that because the words "in any section or community" are to be found in the bill, that will be held to be a regulation of intrastate commerce, because the other clauses of the bill would control, and as we are legislating only with reference to interstate commerce this language would be construed to apply to the creation of a local restraint by some one engaged in interstate commerce, and the restraint must be applied to interstate commerce and nothing else.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Missouri whether, if the amendment offered by me is adopted, it will not be entirely unnecessary to consider that question?

Mr. REED. Not if I understand the Senator's amendment. What is the point? I do not catch it.

Mr. WALSH. If all the language I now move to strike out, "or to create a monopoly of any line of trade," or, as it now reads, "any line of commerce," striking out also the words "in any section or community"—if all that is stricken out, then it will not be necessary to consider the matter now advanced by the Senator from Missouri. If, however, the language is left in as it is, then his observations will be pertinent.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator propose to strike out all of that matter?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think this is as good a time as any to present this matter in a little different shape; and if the amendment to the amendment which I now propose is accepted it will cover the whole question.

I move, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, that section 8 be amended so that it will read as follows:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce in the same line or lines of business.

Mr. President, we have taken much time on this bill. There has been a great deal of haggling over this section.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire whether that is intended as a substitute for the entire section, or merely for the first paragraph?

Mr. REED. It is intended as a substitute for the first paragraph, and is so stated in the print.

If I can get the attention of the Senate just a moment upon this matter, long enough to state it so that everybody has his attention directed to it, I shall be content.

One of the greatest evils we have to meet to-day is the device by which one corporation controls another corporation. That was, as has been often said in these debates, illegal at common law. It was beyond the power of one corporation to own the stock of another corporation, and for manifest reasons which I need not pause now even to mention.

Gradually, in State after State, corporations have slipped amendments into State statutes abrogating that old rule, and immediately corporations began extending their influence through a chain of corporations. These corporations that were controlled frequently were controlled secretly. Frequently the minority stockholders were in this way practically deprived of any voice whatever in the corporations. Frequently a local corporation found a majority of its stock owned by some foreign or distant corporation, and accordingly its control taken over.

I might dilate upon these evils, but they are understood, and they are recognized, too, by this legislation; but the legislation as it is now proposed has so many exceptions and introduces so many doubtful questions that I think it will amount to but little. For my part, I stand ready to vote for a bill that will prohibit any corporation from owning the stock of any other corporation, the two being engaged in interstate commerce; but I am offering an amendment very much milder than that. It simply proposes that a corporation engaged in interstate commerce shall not own the stock of another corporation engaged in the same line of business, to wit, a corporation which is naturally competitive. That does away entirely with all the difficulties that were raised here a day or two ago in the debate, when it was said that it would be difficult to ascertain whether in fact a corporation was competing or not, a difficulty which appears upon the face of the amendment which is now before the committee.

What harm will come, what wrong will come, from saying to a corporation that is engaged in interstate commerce, "You can not own the stock of another corporation engaged in the identical line or lines of business in which you are engaged"? This applies only to trade and commerce. It does not apply to a bank; it does not apply to a corporation that is engaged in intrastate commerce; and it strikes at the very root of this evil. It can be safely enacted into a statute. It saves all the equivocation and all the trouble that will arise from construction of the section as written.

It is easy to ascertain whether a corporation is engaged in the same line or lines of business in which another corporation is engaged, but it is very difficult to tell whether the ownership of stock has substantially lessened competition, and yet there may be a very grave lessening of competition. You avoid the difficulty of proving that most difficult question of fact.

I really think the chairman of the committee might consider whether he could not accept this amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the Senator's amendment; but I should like to ask whether, unless it is designed as a substitute for the second paragraph of section 8 also, it would go as far as it should go. In other words, I wish to ask whether, if his amendment should be adopted as a substitute for the first paragraph of section 8, its effect would not be largely neutralized by the recitals of the second paragraph, beginning with line 21 of the old print, line 12 of page 9 of the new print.

Mr. REED. I think the first part of the clause to which the Senator calls attention—

> This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition——

Mr. THOMAS. No; my question did not refer to that, but to the preceding paragraph. That is the third paragraph which the Senator reads. The paragraph beginning with line 12 of the new print, which the Senator has, is the one to which my question is directed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think a similar amendment ought to go in the next section. In fact, I feel pretty sure it should. Just at present I have offered it as to the first section, and if it is accepted I shall offer it as to the next section.

Mr. CULBERSON. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, I will say frankly that I have not had an opportunity to consult the committee and am not authorized to accept the amendment proposed. Only a few of them are within reach, and they are divided on the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a final word. If this amendment is accepted as to the first paragraph—and it does seem to me it should be, if we are to breathe any real vitality into this section; at least, it will remove many difficulties from the enforcement of it—I will then offer it as to the second paragraph.

That is all I care to say. I think I have stated my position, and I will let the Senate vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, let us have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the first paragraph of section 8, on page 8, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

> That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce in the same line or lines of business.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I withhold my vote unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I announce the same pair and transfer as heretofore and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name called). Repeating the announcement made on the last roll call concerning both my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is absent by permission of the Senate, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Again transferring my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON. I transfer my pair, which I have previously announced, to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], with whom I am paired, is not here. I therefore transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and withhold my vote.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. OWEN. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. Being informed that no quorum has voted, I vote "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] the yeas are 21 and the nays are 24.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will transfer my pair——

Mr. O'GORMAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New York is here. I vote "yea."

Mr. O'GORMAN. I vote "nay."

Mr. BORAH. I vote "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas are 23 and the nays are 25. A quorum has not voted.

The vote by yeas and nays, the result of which was announced by the Vice President, was as follows:

YEAS—23.

Borah	Jones	Norris	Thomas
Burton	Lane	Owen	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Perkins	Walsh
Clapp	McCumber	Poindexter	White

La Follette	Robinson	Stephenson	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hughes	Overman	Smoot
Borah	Johnson	Owen	Sterling
Bryan	Jones	Perkins	Swanson
Burton	Lane	Pittman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Poindexter	Thompson
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Pomerene	Thornton

Clark, Wyo.	Myers	Shafroth	Walsh
Culberson	Nelson	Sheppard	White
Dillingham	Newlands	Shields	Williams
Gallinger	Norris	Simmons
Hollis	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. CLAPP. As is well known, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent from the Chamber on account of sickness. I do not care to make the announcement every day; but still, I presume, in justice to him, it should appear while his sickness lasts, especially where it seems difficult, as now, to get a quorum. I therefore make the announcement.

Mr. FALL and Mr. SMITH of Georgia entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. WHITE. The junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] is absent on account of the sickness of a relative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate heretofore given and request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. LEWIS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered the roll call. There is a quorum present.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 29, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Charles H. Hume, of Bartlesville, Okla., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, we invoke Thy blessing upon us to-day as we pray for Thy guiding hand and spirit upon our Representatives that they shall represent and guide our Nation. Bless the nations to-day and bring speedily peace to all the world. Keep and protect all of these now and evermore. We ask all these blessings in the name of our Saviour and Redeemer. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BUTLER. I demand the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the presence of a quorum; evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 301 Members answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors and the Clerk will read the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea.

And the House amendment and message of the Senate requesting a conference with the House thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a recent article by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. MOSS], published in the Indiana Farmer, the title of which is, "How the war will affect American agriculture."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article written by his colleague [Mr. MOSS of Indiana] on how the European war will affect American agriculture. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CROP MOVEMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to the plan that has been adopted by the Treasury Department to facilitate the crop movement of this country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a recent statement by the Secretary of the Treasury on the crop movement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SPEECH OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON COTTON SITUATION.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech of Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo on the cotton situation at the cotton conference held last Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asks unanimous consent to print a speech made by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of cotton, at a recent conference held. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POTATO CROP.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the potato crop.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the potato crop. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SHORTAGE OF CATTLE IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of the shortage of cattle in the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the shortage of cattle in the United States. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY TO FEMALE AMERICAN CITIZEN.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments on House bill 11745, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 1657) to provide for a second homestead on desert-land entries.

Mr. MANN. Where is that, on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. The Clerk had the wrong one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but which is the right one?

Mr. FERRIS. The one which the Clerk has in his hand.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk can not report a copy of that kind. Where is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent change of reference was made of the bill (S. 2692) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell all unsold lots in the town site of Plummer, Kootenai County, Idaho, and for other purposes, from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries, and ask to agree to the same. It was printed, under the rule, day before yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the bill H. R. 1657. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1116).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. MYERS,
C. S. THOMAS,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted with the accompanying conference report as to each of the Senate amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 1: The House concurs in the Senate amendment, as the report from the Secretary of the Interior and the experience of those Members of the Senate and House who are personally familiar with this matter are to the effect that "where an applicant has been so unfortunate as to fail in two or more previous efforts to obtain a home on the public lands that the Secretary of the Interior should have the discretion to grant such an applicant a further entry upon his showing that he has lost his former entry through no fault of his own," and that the former entry or entries were made in good faith and were "lost, forfeited, or abandoned through matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his rights or committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries." The Secretary of the Interior very positively and specifically recommends that change in all of his reports on bills similar to this, including the report on this bill.

On amendment No. 2: The House concurs in the Senate amendment for the same reasons that it concurs in amendment No. 1, which is identically the same one made in another portion of the bill.

On amendment No. 3: The House concurs in the Senate amendment, as that provision which was stricken out by the Senate seems to be wholly unnecessary for the full protection of the Government, and it would work an unwarranted hardship upon a large number of bona fide entrymen. The Secretary of the Interior, in his report of May 3, 1913, to the chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, on a similar bill to this one, and which report is also incorporated in the report on this bill in the House (Rept. No. 137), very forcibly presents the hardships that this provision would entail upon entrymen. The language is as follows:

"If the entryman received for his relinquishment any amount in excess of the filing fees, he would be debarred from making a second entry. In many cases entrymen receive small amounts at time of relinquishment, in the nature of recompense for buildings or other improvements they have placed upon the land, and which can be utilized by succeeding entrymen, or seek to recoup themselves for expenditures in connection with preparation and filing of papers relating to their original entries. One instance brought to the attention of the department was that of a party who paid a filing fee of $16 at time of original entry, but who incurred a small additional expense in having his papers executed before a United States commissioner, his total expenditure exceeding $20. He received for his relinquishment $20. Believing himself entitled so to do, he settled upon other lands, for which he applied to make second entry; but upon his statement that he had received $4 in excess of the filing fees paid, the department was obliged, under the provisions of the applicable law, to refuse his second entry.

"It is believed that the legislation should be so drawn as to discourage and prevent speculation in the sale of relinquishments, but should not deprive the entryman who loses his original entry through no fault of his own from recovering, in part at least, the sums expended by him in good faith in connection with his original entry or its improvement."

Your committee therefore believes that it is in the interest of good administration to follow the recommendations of the Interior Department and eliminate that requirement.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] yield to me five minutes?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the conference report or vote against it, and yet I doubt if the bill as agreed to in conference is in as satisfactory a form as it was when it passed the House.

I desire to call the attention of the members of the Committee on the Public Lands to the effect of adopting the first two Senate amendments, which insert the word "entries" after the word "entry" in each case. The evident intent of that was to allow a homestead or desert entryman who has already had a second entry which he did not perfect to make a third attempt or fourth attempt. Now, my opinion is, and that has been the theory on which we have legislated heretofore, that that can be done without the insertion of those words, and has been done in the past, under the laws heretofore passed on this subject. All that the Secretary needs to know when an application is made for a second entry is that the immediately prior entry was in fact abandoned.

The fact that the entryman might in some former period have abandoned another entry should not be material. But the adoption of these words and the language that follows creates this situation, I fear. This law is rather drastic in its provisions, much more so than the second-entry bills we have passed heretofore. It provides that an entryman can not have a second entry who has abandoned his former entry through any fault of his own or for any reason under his control. An administration not kindly disposed could, I think, legally hold that very few entrymen abandon entries for causes not within their control, and the result would be, unless this bill is very liberally construed, that few second entries will be allowed. But that is not the worst of it. This is intended to be retroactive, apparently, and to give the Secretary an opportunity, where an application is made for what would be in fact a third entry, to go back and review the conditions of the original entry. Under former laws the entryman was allowed the second entry if he abandoned for any reason whatever. He was not required to give any reason. He had abandoned, he had received no consideration, and was entitled to try again. Now, if he is compelled to go back and prove, with regard to that entry, that he abandoned it for causes not within his control and through no fault of his own he will have a trying time, I fear. We may hope the department will never do that. The department has authority to, under the legislation, and they have done many things not so far-fetched as that. The gentleman from Oklahoma suggested this morning that I had been opposed to the last amendment of the Senate, which was stricken out in conference. I was not entirely opposed to that. I am rather in favor of that Senate provision in a different form. Our former second-entry laws, while they have been very liberal in this respect, that they have allowed a second entry without calling on the entryman to say why he abandoned his former entry, have always been drawn so as to prevent speculation in entries; and speculation in entries enters the moment you give the entryman a right to a second entry when he has abandoned his first entry for a consideration. Now, our prior second-entry laws did not allow a second entry where there had been speculative consideration, the first where there had been any consideration, the last, the one passed three years ago, where the consideration had been above the filing fee. I fear the act, perhaps the best that could be secured under the circumstances, will make it difficult for the entryman to secure a second entry in any case and will have a tendency to encourage speculation in entries, neither of which conditions I think we care to create.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Wyoming, I will say that I introduced this bill, H. R. 1657, on the opening day of this Congress, April 7, 1913, and it, together with several other bills having practically the same purpose in view, and introduced at various times since by various Senators and Representatives, have been pending before the Public Lands Committees of the Senate and

House and upon the calendar of the two bodies for the past year and a half. Both committees have had many conferences upon this subject, and while this bill that has now finally been agreed upon by both committees of the Senate and House and the conference committee is passing in my name, it is a composite of the various bills and ideas of not only the House but of the Interior Department upon this subject.

It is not as liberal as some of us would like to see it. There are some provisions in it that I think are unnecessarily harsh, and some of our ultraconservationist friends think that the provision stricken out by the Senate should remain in; nevertheless, it is the best bill that can be passed through this Congress, and we all believe that it is an exceptionally beneficial measure.

As the House well knows, for many years nearly every Congress has passed some relief bill for both the homestead and desert-land entrymen who have lost their lands through no fault of their own. Those have been temporary bills, and have not only taken up considerable time of Congress, but it has been difficult for the public in general to keep track of them. The Interior Department and the General Land Office have for a number of years desired to have a general law, such as this is, to settle the rights of the public-land entrymen once and for all, as near as one act can.

It is especially desirous to have one general and brief law, so that the settlers who have lost their entries, and who will come within the provisions of this law, may be able to learn definitely what it is. It has been practically impossible for anyone who is not a lawyer to keep track of all these temporary acts, and I know that his law will tend to better administration and aid in the settlement of the West and afford an opportunity to a great many deserving citizens to acquire a home on the public domain.

From the information of the Members representing the public-land States it is conclusively shown that the interests of the public will be benefited and the rights of the Government thoroughly protected by the passage of this bill, and many worthy persons, who, through misfortune and hardships incident to frontier life, have been deprived of any actual benefit from any entry of public lands, notwithstanding they have put in many years of their life in the hardest kind of toil and privation, will be given another opportunity to acquire a home. It is a just and in reality a humane measure that will be of great benefit in the development of the West.

The form of the bill as agreed upon by your conference committee, and which the Senate has already adopted and which I earnestly hope this House will now adopt, is as follows:

That any person otherwise duly qualified to make entry or entries of public lands under the homestead or desert-land laws, who has heretofore made or may hereafter make entry under said laws, and who, through no fault of his own, may have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, or who may hereafter lose, forfeit, or abandon same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead or desert-land laws as though such former entry or entries had never been made: Provided, That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith, were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries.

Mr. Speaker, There are many reasons why I believe the enactment of this law will be in accordance with sound public policy and in the interest of the development of the West.

While our Government has in former years been extremely generous in the disposition of the public lands, yet everyone from the West knows that in recent years the regulations of the Department of the Interior in regard to the qualifications for entry, residence, and improvements on lands entered under the homestead and desert-land laws have often been harshly strict in their requirements. The interpretation of the law during recent years has also frequently been unreasonably burdensome; and the homestead settlers have not only been held to a literal compliance with the law, but to a strict and technical compliance with many regulations, some of which have been impractical and have often caused a forfeiture of their rights or worked a very great, inequitable, and unwarranted hardship upon the poor but bona fide settlers upon the public domain. The ever-present special field agents and inspectors have been on hand to protest any proof offered where it has been thought the settler has not fully and technically complied with all the requirements of the law and regulations with respect to residence, cultivation, and improvements.

Until we passed the three-year homestead act of June 6, 1912, and upon which many of you will remember I worked so long, a residence of five years was required under the homestead law before the settler was permitted to make final proof and receive patent. The act of June 6, 1912, reduces the period of residence from five to three years "from the time of establishing actual, permanent residence upon the land." The requirements of this law and the department in regard to cultivation are much more strict and expensive than under the old five-year homestead law.

The richest and most fertile of the agricultural lands belonging to the public domain in all the Western and Northwestern States were taken many years ago, and now we only have left lands that have for the past 50 years been passed over as being too expensive to clear or not worth taking. Under the laws existing from 1876 until 1890 a qualified settler had, as it was termed, his "three rights." First, a preemption right provided for by section 2259 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which he could acquire title to 160 acres of land by six months' residence and cultivation and on payment of $1.25 per acre; second, a timber-culture entry right, under which he could acquire title to 160 acres of land without residence thereon and by cultivating 10 acres thereof to trees, and at the end of 8 years, and not exceeding 10 years, paying the land-office fees, amounting to the sum of $14; and, third, his homestead right under section 2289, Revised Statutes, whereunder he could acquire a patent to a homestead of 160 acres after five years' residence and cultivation and upon the payment of the land-office fees of $14. He had, under the law, the privilege of making commutation proof on his homestead after six months' residence and cultivation, and in case of commutation he was required to pay, in addition to such land-office fees, the sum of $1.25 per acre, the same as in the case of a preemption. If the entryman had served as a soldier in the War of the Rebellion, his period of service was credited on the time he was required to reside on his homestead.

But with the passing into private ownership of the best public lands and the consequent upbuilding of all the great Western States by the owners of those lands, the liberal land laws and liberal construction thereof of earlier days have also passed into history, and the homesteader of to-day is confronted with an entirely different situation.

The timber-culture law has been repealed. The preemption law has been repealed, excepting as to a few very small tracts of Indian reservation land. There were only 22 preemption entries made in the United States during the past fiscal year.

The stone-and-timber law has been practically rendered inoperative by regulations. There were during the last fiscal year only 946 final entries made under that law in the United States.

The present isolated-tract law, of which I am the author, one of the most beneficial laws on the statute books, has likewise been practically nullified by regulations. The entries do not seem to be reported, but the total number during the last year was probably much less than 500.

The desert-land law was years ago attended with considerable irregularities and some fraud, but in recent years it has, owing to regulations, been attended with so much hardship that it is also becoming unimportant. Throughout the entire United States there were only 2,102 final desert-land entries made during the last fiscal year. While I have been instrumental in bringing about some beneficial amendments to this law, especially allowing an extension to 10 years under certain conditions, nevertheless the law is not affording as much relief or aiding the settlement of the arid West as much as it should.

The enlarged-homestead act applies only to certain nonirrigable land in the semiarid portions of certain States, and the Kinkaid Act applies to only a portion of Western Nebraska. There were only 737 final mineral entries and 76 coal-land entries in this entire country during the past fiscal year, ending June 30, 1913.

So that with the above comparatively negligible exceptions, there is not, and has not been for several years past, any other method of acquiring title to any portions of our agricultural or nonmineral public domain except through homestead entry, with the very strict requirements of that law and the regulations thereunder. The records of our General Land Office show in a very striking way the marvelous benefits of a liberal homestead law. During the first year after the passage of the three-year homestead law, the final homestead entries throughout the United States more than doubled. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, the total homestead entries throughout the United States were 24,326, covering 4,306,068 acres of land. The three-year homestead law was passed on June 6, 1912, and during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, there were in the United States 53,252 final homestead entries made, covering more than 10,000,000 acres of the public domain; and notwithstanding that this law requires much more cultivation and improvements than the old five-year homestead law.

While there will probably be some less homestead entries during the present fiscal year, the above figures conclusively show the benefits of that law, and illustrate why it is that hundreds of thousands of our citizens go to Canada to obtain a home.

The most desirable portions of the agricultural lands having been selected and entered many years ago, and the lands opened for homestead settlement for the last several years being in that part of the country where there is liable to be in any year or through a series of years an insufficient rainfall for the successful raising of crops, it is hardly to be expected that such lands would be taken and occupied unless conditions in regard to qualifications for entry, residence, and cultivation were otherwise favorable.

The opening up for homestead settlement of the rich agricultural lands in the three great Canadian Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta has been in itself an inducement for the emigration of citizens of many States, especially those along the Canadian border, into Canada in order that they might acquire title to land and make for themselves a home.

The law in regard to the proof of residence and cultivation is evidently more liberal than our own homestead laws. Section 126 provides that—

Proof of residence or cultivation required by the three last preceding sections of this act, and of the erection of a habitable house, shall be made by the claimant by affidavit, and shall be corroborated by the evidence on oath of two disinterested witnesses resident in the vicinity of the land to which the evidence relates, and shall be subject to acceptance as sufficient by the commissioner of Dominion lands or the Dominion lands board; and such affidavit shall be sworn and such evidence given before the local agent or his senior assistant, or before some other persons named for that place by the minister.

The Canadian law has the further liberal provision that—

If the father (or the mother if the father is deceased) of any person who is eligible to make a homestead entry * * * resides upon a farm in the vicinity of the land entered for by such person, the requirements * * * as to residence prior to obtaining patent may be satisfied by such person residing with the father or mother. (Sec. 131, Dom. Lands, Rev. Stat., 1906.)

The Canadian laws also make provision for the settling of homesteaders together in a hamlet or village in numbers embracing at least 20 families, with a view to greater convenience in the establishment of schools and churches, and in such cases the minister is permitted to vary or dispense with the requirements of the law in regard to residence. (Sec. 121, Dom. Lands, Rev. Stat., 1906.)

And if any settler has his permanent residence upon farming land owned by him in the vicinity of his homestead, the requirements of the law in regard to residence may be satisfied by residence upon said land. (Sec. 132, Dom. Lands, Rev. Stat., 1906.)

The reason for the emigration of our young men and citizens to Canada is easily found in these liberal provisions of Canadian homestead law, and in the prospect of securing title to lands equal, if not superior, to any now remaining in our public domain and open to homestead settlement.

The records show that it is now, and has for several years been, a serious question with any prospective homesteader of full age as to which of the two offers he will accept, namely, that of the United States, permitting him to enter any quarter section yet open for settlement under our homestead laws and present regulations with the conditions they impose, or that of the Dominion of Canada, under the prospects and liberal conditions there existing.

It should not be a matter of wonder that hundreds of thousands of such prospective homeseekers have accepted the latter proposition, even though it involved a renunciation of their American citizenship.

But with the minor of 18 years of age desirous of acquiring land, which everybody knows he is capable of improving and cultivating, there is no choice. He must emigrate to Canada or remain without the land. I have a bill now pending on our calendar permitting any boy or girl 18 years of age or over to make a homestead entry. I have, by authority of the Public Lands Committee, made a very exhaustive and, I think, strong report upon it, and I earnestly hope I may be able to pass it before this Sixty-third Congress adjourns.

The figures showing the numbers who have emigrated to Canada during the last 10 years are somewhat startling.

On January 28 of the present year Mr. William J. White, being a witness before the lobby investigating committee of the Senate, in answer to questions propounded by Senator NELSON, said:

Senator NELSON. What is the number of the immigrants that have come from the United States to your Provinces during the last 4 or 5 years or the last 10 years?

Mr. WHITE. This last year up till November there were about 115,000. Last year up to the present time there were about 141,000. The year before that there were about 110,000, and the year before that the same. It has been running along about 100,000, last——

Senator NELSON. Ten years, has it not?

Mr. WHITE. It has been running about 100,000 for the last five years. Last year—that is, the fiscal year ending March, 1913—was our largest year. There were about 141,000.

Senator NELSON. And for the last five or six years the general average has been 100,000?

Mr. WHITE. Yes; about 100,000.

Senator NELSON. And how many have you gotten in all from the United States in the last 10 years, we will say?

Mr. WHITE. Our records will show that we have had about 800,000. Some of them have been going back and going into Montana and taking up homesteads in Montana, and we may not have as many as 800,000.

Mr. White is the agent and representative of the Canadian Dominion, and is, or was at the time of giving his testimony, in charge of the advertising, and had been in charge of such advertising for a number of years, and according to his statement his Government spends between $60,000 and $70,000 a year in such advertising. (See pp. 4686–4690 of hearings.)

In view of all these conditions, the Public Lands Committee and everyone familiar with conditions in the West believe the time is at hand when the Government as a matter of wise public policy should adopt a more liberal rule as to the disposition of its remaining agricultural lands.

Those 800,000 American citizens who have expatriated themselves for a home were the farmers and young men, the bone and sinew, the best citizenship of this country, and their loss to our country is beyond the possibility of any estimation. They are the kind of people we most need at this time. With our agricultural productions decreasing at a terrific and alarming rate, as compared with our increase in population; with our high cost of living still getting higher; with our 665,891,020 acres of unappropriated and unreserved public domain, besides 185,000,000 acres of forest reserves, all of which is producing comparatively nothing and costing millions of dollars a year to supervise, it would seem as though it is time to change somewhat our public-land policy and allow at least the agricultural portions of this land to go into private ownership and be used for the homes of our citizens and the production of agricultural crops. It is not only a colossal financial blunder, but an outrage against the present generation, to hold all of that imperial domain in idleness for future generations when every township of cultivated land increases the wealth of the State a million dollars every year.

The most beneficial use is the only kind of conservation that should be practiced by our Government. It is not conservation of agricultural lands to make no use of them, except for grazing purposes, and keep them in the barren state in which they have existed for thousands of years. Let us cease driving good American citizens to Canada for land. Let us give our people a home on our public domain and welcome them to an abiding place under our own flag.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following resolution from the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 136) to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea, and the House amendment and the message of the Senate requesting a conference with the House thereon.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when did the message from the Senate come over in reference to that?

The SPEAKER. It came over yesterday. The message from the Senate sending the bill over, disagreeing to the House amendment, asking for a conference, and announcing the Senate conferees, came over yesterday. This message came over just this minute. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following telegram, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

GAINESVILLE, GA., August 28, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

TOM BELL physically unable to make trip to Washington. Wire 10 days' leave of absence.

E. P. HAM, M. D.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? Without objection, it will be granted.

There was no objection.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 6357, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 6357, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of this bill has been read, and amendments are now in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That there is established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of war-risk insurance, the director of which shall be entitled to a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I shall probably vote for the pending bill——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to request that the amendment be read again before he proceeds?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I shall probably vote for the pending bill, but I am not convinced either as to the necessity, the wisdom, the expediency, or the safety of its enactment.

This bill proposes to provide for war-risk insurance. I do not know whether it is intended to include ordinary marine insurance. There is no trouble to-day, so far as I am informed—and I have made some inquiry—about American vessels obtaining war-risk insurance or marine insurance. The purpose of this bill is to insure American vessels and American cargoes against the risks of war and to have them insured by the Government. In support of the bill it is asserted that Great Britain is reinsuring 80 per cent of the war-risk insurance upon British vessels and cargoes written by the underwriters of Great Britain.

But that situation is entirely different from the situation which confronts this country. Great Britain is a belligerent nation, at war with at least two of the continental powers. Her ships are liable to seizure, whether carrying contraband or noncontraband material. It is highly dangerous and extra-hazardous to sail her ships upon the seas; and for her own interest, purely as a war measure, Great Britain, to encourage her ships to keep the sea, announces that she will assume 80 per cent of the risk of seizure or destruction.

American vessels, flying the American flag, are the vessels of a neutral nation—subject to search, but not to seizure unless they are violating some well-known principle of international law. Their cargoes are not subject to seizure unless they are contraband under the principles of international law. American enterprise, if this be a paying business, will furnish all the opportunity desired to insure against all marine risks or against war risks for American cargoes and American ships. If it be something that can not be profitable from any standpoint, then the Government will have the opportunity to bear the loss. I do not believe it proper or advisable under existing circumstances that the Federal Government should assume all possibility of risks in purely commercial transactions when this country is at peace with the entire world.

But there is one feature of this legislation that is highly dangerous to the peace and security of the United States. There is a dispute now as to whether the transfer of a vessel flying the flag of a belligerent to a neutral nation after war has been declared protects the vessel when flying the neutral flag. There is no unanimity of opinion about it. The great bulk of vessels under foreign flags that may be acquired and insured under this bill are vessels now of German register. Practically the entire German merchant marine is lying idle in the harbors of neutral nations or in their own harbors. The German Government, under its legislation by which these ships are subsidized, has some interest of a financial character in those vessels, because the German Government has the right to take them over for war purposes. A very serious question arises as to whether the transfer of such vessels to the American flag would prevent their seizure and condemnation in a prize court by any one of the nations with which Germany is at war.

More than that, if such vessels be transferred to the American flag and insured by the American Government, and then seized by Great Britain or France or Russia, they will demand the payment of the insurance, and the United States Government, under the law of insurance, would be subrogated to the rights of the owners of the ships and the owners of the cargoes, and we would at once be precipitated into a controversy with the nation seizing the vessel. The controversy would not be as to certain rights of citizens but as to the rights of the United States and the rights of other nations. I say it is a menace, and unless there is some overwhelming and compelling necessity it should not be forced upon us.

In spite of my doubts about the wisdom of the bill, I shall probably vote for it. [Laughter.] It is easy to laugh. The administration is responsible for the legislation. It asserts it to be necessary. I shall resolve my doubts in favor of the position of the administration and support the bill, having expressed my views briefly upon it.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. Though I have these very grave doubts at this time on this bill, I am willing to surrender them; but I shall not surrender my doubts or my convictions upon legislation proposing to appropriate equally large or larger sums from the Treasury if reported to this House hereafter by another committee which has no jurisdiction over appropriations. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland for a question.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I want to ask the gentleman if he recalls a single instance where a neutral has gotten into war over the question of the seizure of one of its vessels?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not looked it up. I am not familiar with the precedents. There may or may not be such cases. I am speaking about the situation that may menace us. That is the case of German ships, which the German Government has a right to take into its naval reserves or active naval forces, because of its contracts with them and subventions and subsidies paid to them. To transfer such ships to the American flag and to have them insured by the United States under this legislation, then if such ships are seized the United States will be face to face with many difficult questions that will arise.

Mr. Chairman, this paragraph which I have moved to strike out was drawn by those in one of the departments who prepared this bill. As nearly as I can ascertain, its ostensible purpose is to take out of the classified service all positions created in this bureau, the compensation of which is in excess of $3,000. Under the civil-service law and under the decisions of the Attorney General, the provision is wholly ineffective to accomplish that result.

I believe the compensation of the director of this bureau, which is to be a temporary bureau, will be sufficient if fixed at $5,000, the same as the compensation of the heads of the great bulk of the bureaus of the Government. If I may have the permission of the committee, I shall put in the RECORD a statement showing the compensation of the heads of the various bureaus of the Government.

I believe it is sufficiently important that the head of this bureau should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and even if this provision were effective to take out of the classified service all employees whose compensation shall be in excess of $3,000 it would be ill-advised legislation to enact, because the temptation would be continually to fix salaries higher than might probably be desired or necessary in order to make the appointments regardless of the civil-service laws. The President has complete authority to exempt from the civil-service laws every position or any position that may be created in this bureau. I believe the responsibility should be his, and not ours, for exempting them. [Applause.]

Statement referred to above is as follows:

$6,000 BUREAUS.

Supervising Architect.
Comptroller of the Treasury.
Commissioner of Internal Revenue ($6,500).
Engraving and Printing.
Surgeon General, Public Health Service.
Geological Survey.
Bureau of Mines.
Coast Survey.
Bureau of Fisheries.

Census Office.
Bureau of Standards.
Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.
Librarian of Congress ($6,500).

$5,000 OR LESS.

All bureaus of the Department of Agriculture. The salary of the Chief of the Weather Bureau was reduced for the fiscal year 1915 from $6,000 to $5,000.
Commissioners of the District of Columbia.
Civil Service Commissioners.
All assistant secretaries of executive departments.
Six auditors of the Treasury for the several departments.
Register of Treasury.
Superintendent of Life-Saving Service.
Chief of Secret Service.
Director of the Mint.
All assistant treasurers of the United States.
All superintendents of mints.
Solicitors of the various departments.
Commissioner of General Land Office.
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.
Commissioner of Pensions.
Commissioner of Patents.
Commissioner of Education.
Four Assistant Postmasters General.
Director of Postal Savings.
Commissioner of Corporations.
Commissioner of Lighthouses.
Supervising Inspector General, Steamboat Inspection.
Commissioner of Navigation.
Commissioner of Labor Statistics.
Commissioner of Immigration.
Commissioner of Naturalization.
Chief of Children's Bureau.
Public Printer ($5,500).

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I seldom differ with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] upon any question before this House involving appropriations, because I regard him as one of the ablest, if not the ablest, men who has ever presided over his great committee. [Applause.] I recognize his thorough acquaintance with and understanding of all the difficult questions that are involved in the control of the appropriations of this House and the protection of the Government. But I do not agree with him in his efforts to amend this bill.

If this were not an emergency bill I would agree with him at once. The general proposition that he states is correct; but, as I pointed out yesterday, for nearly 10 days American ships, flying the American flag, have been in the harbors of this country, from Maine around the coast to California, laden with American goods for export, and the Secretary of the Treasury has telegrams—I have some myself—saying that they can not sail because they can not get insurance, as the owners of the property will not allow the ships to sail until the insurance is furnished. This is an emergency matter. It is a matter that, instead of being passed to-day, should have been passed a week ago. Now, what is the result of the gentleman's amendment? The gentleman proposes to strike out all of section 1 after the word "Treasury" in line 1, page 2. He leaves in the section as it stands to-day the following words:

That there is hereby established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of war-risk insurance, the director and employees of which shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

He proposes to strike out the words "the salary of the director shall be $6,000 per annum" and to change the salary to $5,000. Then he strikes out the following:

And the salaries of the other employees shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case to exceed $5,000 per annum for any employee: Provided, That all employees receiving a salary of $3,000 per annum or less shall be subject to the civil-service laws and regulations thereunder.

If the gentleman's amendment were to be adopted, the minor effect of it would be to reduce the salary of the head of this bureau from $6,000 to $5,000; but the important part of his amendment is that after you pass this bill you will have to come back to the Congress of the United States, either by an emergency appropriation bill or some other method, to provide the employees to run this bureau.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is another section of the bill which provides $100,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the bureau.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it does not authorize the appointment of employees. I have not read the gentleman's amendment, but I am stating it as I understand it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Section 8 provides all the money that is necessary to pay the employees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Section 8 reads:

That there is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the bureau of war-risk insurance, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

That might be construed as authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ these persons, but it might be construed the other way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit me, I propose to offer an amendment to section 8 to make certain that the $100,000 can be utilized for the appointment of these persons in the service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was the proposition I had in mind. Of course, I did not know the gentleman's purpose when he got to section 8. But, as the bill stands, if you strike out this provision that the Secretary of the Treasury may employ other persons besides the head of this bureau, unless the amendment which the gentleman says he will offer to section 8 is adopted, you would have a bureau created and have to come back to Congress to put it into force.

The gentleman from New York does not really object to that provision, because it makes little difference whether you provide in section 1 that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right to employ additional force, or whether you amend section 8 hereafter and provide for it. The main difference between the gentleman from New York and this bill is the question whether or not you shall exempt from civil-service rules and regulations any of these employees that get over $3,000 a year. Those that get under $3,000 a year would be under the civil service now. Now, we are not in the insurance business. It would take a long time, at least several weeks, if you were to have a civil-service examination to select men who are acquainted with the insurance business who could properly handle these risks. The gentleman from New York says the President, under the general power given, could waive the civil-service examination and appoint these men. Why should we put it on the President if we think it is right? Why should not we take the responsibility of waiving the civil service ourselves, and it is apparent that it must be waived? It is apparent that this bureau must be organized at the very earliest moment, and it is apparent that you must get experts that are not on the list of the civil-service employees. Therefore in order to expedite this legislation that is needed so badly, as this bill has already been passed by the Senate, I favor adopting the Senate bill and let the President affix his signature to the bill at his earliest convenience and allow these ships laden with American goods to go to sea and help the commerce of American citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to section 5 of the bill, which especially provides for the expert board the gentleman has been speaking about. That is entirely different from the provisions of the section that is now sought to be amended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is merely providing for additional experts to those provided for in the first section. If we do not want to make mistakes about this, they should be expert insurance men. That is all I desire to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. I move to strike out the words "Treasury Department" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Department of Commerce."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "Treasury Department" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Department of Commerce."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Commerce was organized to take charge of the work of promoting the commerce of the United States, foreign commerce equally with domestic commerce, and it seems to me the proper place for a bureau of war-risk insurance, which is intended to cover the shipping engaged in the commerce of the United States, is in the Department of Commerce. The Department of the Treasury is already overworked, one might say, with problems that have to do with revenue, with the banking and currency interests of the country, and with the organization of a new banking system. The great variety of its work is such as to make a wise man cautious about adding another bureau.

The Department of Commerce has also to do with the shipping of the country, such as gathering information about foreign commerce and the opportunities in foreign countries for American commerce. The Bureau of Navigation, which is under the Department of Commerce, is charged with general superintendence of the commercial marine. The machinery is already organized in the Department of Commerce to do a large part of the business contemplated in this bill, and it would have to be organized anew in the Department of the Treasury, or the Secretary of the Treasury would have to use the machinery which already exists in the other department. I should like a proper classification of war-risk insurance.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will not agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I see no occasion for any change in the bill. After consultation it was agreed between the departments that this power should be conferred on the Treasury Department. I do not know of any bureau in the Department of Commerce already organized that could take charge of this work. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said, the Department of the Treasury has been designated as the department in which the bureau of war-risk insurance shall be created, and it will be our effort to secure the passage of this bill as it came from the Senate, and there is no occasion to shift the jurisdiction from the Treasury Department to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. TEMPLE. It seems to me that immediately the attention of Members is called to the fact that this bureau is committed to the Department of the Treasury it must be considered inexpedient and unwise to do so. The Treasury Department is already overburdened with its duties, as we are told. It has had much increase added to its duties this year. The Treasury Department is now supposed to be engaged in the most gigantic undertaking ever imposed upon it—to organize and put upon its feet a new banking and currency system; and yet the Treasury Department, which now under the law is charged with the management of the national finances, is to be given additional charge and supervision of the provisions regarding the commerce of the United States, a matter that has nothing to do with the finances of the Government and is utterly foreign to any of the duties now imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

It would seem to me to be a question at least that must arise in the mind of every gentleman who thinks about the matter as to the reason of this. Why is it that this particular bureau, which should go to the Department of Commerce, that has now exclusive jurisdiction of these matters, should be sent to the Treasury Department? Is it for the purpose of discrediting the Department of Commerce? At the head of that department you have perhaps the most skilled expert in public life regarding the question of foreign and domestic commerce. At the head of that department you have the one man that could bring to this question the adequate knowledge that is so much needed, if you shall pass this bill, and yet you propose to send it away from him over to the Department of the Treasury, the department that is already overburdened, and which has nothing whatever to do with questions of commerce and navigation.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The suggestion is that the bill gives jurisdiction to the Treasury Department rather than the Department of Commerce because it is the Treasury Department that has charge of the customs officials, which has to do with the shipping of our country.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that that has nothing to do with this question. The regulations of commerce are all committed to the Department of Commerce. The question of the collection of revenue is entirely separate and apart from that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the Bureau of Navigation, which does have control of the shipping of the country, is in the Department of Commerce, and not in the Treasury Department.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce is in the Department of Commerce. The regulations and rules under which commerce is carried on, both foreign and domestic, are under the jurisdiction of the Commerce Department. All of those things that pertain really to the activities of commerce are under the control and under the supervision of the Department of Commerce. The Secretary of the Treasury does nothing with commerce, as regards its regulation and control. The Treasury Department collects customs duties, as it does the internal revenue, but it does not have jurisdiction over either foreign or domestic commerce. It ought to be self-evident to every man that this board should be under the supervision of that department of the Government which has control of commerce and navigation, and that department is the Department of Commerce. I shall therefore support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated that the purpose of the section in the bill as now written is to enable certain employees to be appointed without regard to the civil-service regulations, without the necessity of a competitive examination. The law is that—

> The classified service shall include all officers and employees in the executive civil service of the United States, heretofore or hereafter appointed or employed, in positions now existing, or hereafter to be created, of whatever function or designation, whether compensated by a fixed salary or otherwise, except persons employed merely as laborers, and persons whose appointments are subject to confirmation by the Senate.

The mere declaration that all employees in this bureau whose compensation is $3,000 or less shall be under the civil-service law and regulations adds no force to the existing law. It merely is declaratory of the law as it exists. A provision which declares part of the law can not be construed as the repeal of the balance of it or the lifting out of the law of certain other positions. Under a decision rendered by the Attorney General of the United States in 1908, when certain employees were provided for in language almost identical with the language used here, in the belief that such employees are not to be under the civil-service law, it was held that that language did not take them from out of those provisions, and employees were appointed as the result of competitive civil-service examinations. If this paragraph be adopted as it is now written into the bill, those employees will be appointed as the result of competitive civil-service examinations, unless the President, exercising the authority conferred upon him, issues an order that certain employees shall be exempt from the operations of the civil-service law.

I have no particular desire to vote for a provision in a bill purporting to accomplish a certain purpose but of absolutely no value to accomplish that purpose. Moreover, I do not believe it either expedient or wise to create subordinate positions in any bureau, whether important or insignificant, and to have the Congress assume to determine the wisdom or expediency of particular employees being exempted from the classified service. The President has full and complete power in that respect. If it be desirable to obtain certain classes of officials without competitive examinations—and it may be necessary in this bureau—there is no reason why the President should not exercise the power conferred upon him, but to determine here that the mere fact that an official is to receive more than $3,000 a year in itself justifies lifting such positions from the operation of the civil-service law, is a departure that is so novel, so contrary to the policy regarding the classified service, that I am not willing to support it.

I wish to make just one more remark, Mr. Chairman. We are told that this bill should be passed as it came from the Senate. I do not know why the House should foreclose itself of its rights to perfect the bill by amendment. [Applause.] The rule under which we are considering this bill specifically provided that the House should adopt amendments, if they were desirable. The Senate did not waive its rights. It did not take this bill as it came from the department and pass it without change. It made some amendments in the bill; and if the Senate can exercise its rights, it seems to me not only proper, but highly important, that in the exercise of our best judgment such amendments as commend themselves as proper to perfect the bill should be adopted by us.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. OGLESBY. If the provisions of this bill are effective, the Secretary of the Treasury and not the President would be empowered to take them out from under the operation of the civil-service law by simply increasing the salary, would he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and that power has never been given heretofore to anyone but the President; but the provisions will not be effective. I have a decision made by the Attorney General on February 12, 1908, in which it is held that the language similar to that contained in this bill, intended to take these employees out of the civil service, is ineffective to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TEMPLE) there were—ayes 56, noes 71.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. TEMPLE and Mr. ADAMSON] reported that there were—ayes 75, noes 78.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold his amendment? The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the motion of the gentleman is to strike out and insert. Is that an amendment to the original——

The CHAIRMAN. It would have been so in the first instance if it had been suggested at that time. It seems to the Chair now that the amendment of the gentleman from New York has been offered and adopted. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had suggested that amendment to perfect the paragraph at the time, it would have had precedence over the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and it does seem to the Chair now that as the amendment of the gentleman from New York has been offered and adopted and that the amendment to the amendment has been voted upon it is proper we should vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York before any other amendment is considered. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. LEVY) there were—ayes 94, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, after the words "bureau of," by striking out the words "war risk."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no amendment is now in order to the amendment which has been adopted, which is to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers his amendment as an amendment to the section which has been stricken out.

Mr. MOORE. We have adopted a section which carries this language, and I desire to strike out the words "war risk," and I will ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment accordingly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I can not hear the gentleman, there is so much disorder, and I do not understand the nature of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment just adopted by striking out, after the words "bureau of," the words "war risk."

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to add to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York——

Mr. CULLOP. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. My point of order, in addition to what the gentleman from New York said, is that it would change the entire character of the bill. This is not a marine-insurance bill; it is a war-risk bill entirely.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the section was stricken out and a new section inserted which perfects the section, and an amendment to that now is not in order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought that point was made by the gentleman from New York; but I did not hear him very well on account of the confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. I desire to make a motion to strike out the preamble. It has not been read, and I do not know whether it will be proper to make it now or to wait until the end of the bill is reached and treat it as part of the title.

The CHAIRMAN. The preamble was read yesterday.

Mr. TOWNER. The RECORD does not so show.

The CHAIRMAN. The RECORD never shows what is read of the bill unless there be amendments proposed. The preamble was read yesterday because the Chair expressly directed the Clerk to read the preamble.

Mr. TOWNER. In any event, my inquiry is pertinent, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the practice which has prevailed in the House, so far as the Chair now remembers, it has been the custom to consider the preamble at the end of the bill where a bill carries a preamble.

Mr. MANN. That is, after the passage of the bill, under the rules, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes upon this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday and to-day caused me very much distress, and I have no doubt he did the House, by his statement concerning the great delay and consequent injury in the shipment of the crops of this country, and that ships were lying for 10 days in American ports which could not go abroad on account of lack of this war insurance. I was anxious to know about this condition this morning, because I realized if continued it would cause serious damage, so I sent for a morning copy of the New York Herald and a morning copy of the Philadelphia Ledger of this morning and also telephoned the shipping commissioner of Philadelphia to know the exact condition to-day as to foreign shipping and the movement of our crops to foreign markets, and I am pleased to give the House the information, and I know the gentleman from Alabama will be very much gratified to know of existing conditions. I read from page 18 of the New York Herald of this morning:

Although wheat is now being exported in record-breaking volume, there was no relaxation in the sterling exchanges. On the contrary, rates were appreciably stiffer. In some quarters this was attributed to the war news, which was interpreted as indicating a protraction of the struggle. In other quarters the high rates were ascribed to competition of individual remitters, with a demand for remittance against the city of New York's maturing obligations abroad.

Bradstreet's estimates the efflux of wheat and flour from both coasts for the week ended yesterday at nearly nine and a half million bushels, while Washington dispatches quoted Treasury officials as estimating the exports for the week ending with to-day at 15,000,000 bushels. Such a movement must speedily create large foreign credits, particularly as imports are now falling off. Evidence of return to normal conditions is seen in the reduction of marine insurance rates and in the notice given by the eastern trunk lines to connecting carriers of a resumption of through bills of lading from interior points to Europe on exports via the Atlantic seaboard.

Again, I will quote from Bradstreet's report for this week:

Bradstreet's will say: "Crop reports are more favorable, particularly as regards cotton, tobacco, and corn; wheat exports, spurred by foreign necessity, are of enormous volume, close to the record, indeed; necessary foodstuffs, such as flour, groceries and allied lines, are in active demand."

Again, from Bradstreet's report of this morning:

Wheat, including flour, exports from the United States and Canada for the week ended August 27, as reported by telegraph to Bradstreet's Journal, aggregate 9,397,627 bushels, the second largest total ever reported, against 6,940,770 bushels last week and 7,042,180 bushels this week last year. For the eight weeks ended August 27 exports are 55,060,012 bushels, against 47,417,532 bushels in the corresponding period last year.

[Applause.]

Again, from the New York Herald, on page 18:

It is also evident that the export demand has fallen off on account of the higher prices, and private cables from Liverpool said that both Roumania and Russia had decided to permit exports of breadstuffs, and this will be in competition with the American market.

The developments in Europe seem to point to a prolonged war, which will increase European requirements. Most of the recent purchases for export have been for quick shipment, and, aside from the wheat, a very large amount of flour has been taken.

I now quote from the morning edition of the Philadelphia Ledger, page 8, the market report:

American steamship Dominion is due to sail for Liverpool at 10 o'clock this morning. Although this vessel has few passengers, she is expected to carry a large general cargo, comprised chiefly of flour, grain, and oil.

Again:

Few steamships are being chartered in any trade. There is still a light demand for tonnage under a free offering of boats, with rates easier.

Again, from "Philadelphia marine notes":

Yesterday was the busiest day at this port since the beginning of the European war. When the exchange closed last night 27 vessels had arrived here or were bound up the Delaware for Philadelphia. Of this number, 9 were barges, 9 schooners, and 9 steamships. Six of the steamships were under foreign flags. Most of the schooners and barges came from New England or eastern ports.

The telephone message from the shipping commissioners indicated that the shipping business in Baltimore and Philadelphia was larger than normal. There were free offerings at reasonable rates and no retarding of business on account of any lack of insurance to be provided by this bill. I am very glad to assure the gentleman from Alabama, and I have no doubt that he is equally happy to know that our grain crops are moving in large and satisfactory volume at good prices, and this will prosper our people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am glad to hear the assurance of the gentleman from Minnesota. Of course, the gentleman from Minnesota and I for many years have stood on different sides of this question. The gentleman from Minnesota is content that foreign ships can carry American commerce. I desire to build up an American merchant marine.

Now, what the gentleman said about our exports, as shown by these papers, I have no doubt is correct. He pointed out to you one American liner, an old one, that was carrying a cargo to Europe. He read you the amount of export wheat that was going from American ports and Canadian ports together; and I have no doubt that what was being carried was being carried to-day, as it has been largely in the past, in British ships, paying British war-rate insurance that the American farmer must take out of his pocket and contribute. What we are trying to do is to provide an American insurance at a reasonable American rate for a country that is not at war, as against a country that is at war and must pay higher rates; and the gentleman would retard the passage of that bill.

Now, I have no doubt that there is a very considerable amount of product in this country that is being moved in British ships to-day. Not a large amount, of course, could be moved in American ships, because we have not the ships. But, as I stated yesterday and state again to-day, American ships from every coast in this country have been wiring to the Secretary of the Treasury saying they can not move their cargoes without this insurance. Why, when I made that statement yesterday the gentleman from Florida, who represents the Pensacola district, said that he had recently been there and that there were four or five large ships waiting in that harbor alone to get insurance so that they could move their cargoes.

Now, I have no doubt that my friend from Minnesota may rejoice in the fact that these American ships can not go to sea and can not carry American cargoes, but there is no denial in the papers that he has read that American ships are deprived of the right of going to sea because they are not furnished with insurance. In fact, the gentleman from Minnesota himself stated yesterday the reason. He stated that the insurance companies in this country, the only insurance companies under which an American ship can get insurance, had stated to his committee that they were unable to insure these cargoes because they did not have the capital and the responsibility so to do. And it is necessary for this Government to aid in this matter. Why should we not extend aid?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then the real purpose of this bill is not to move the American crops, but to insure a transfer of ships from foreign flags to the American flag by giving the owners a bonus or subsidy for that purpose? Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am afraid my friend from Minnesota has a very fevered imagination in regard to this bill. As far as I am concerned, I would welcome ships owned by American citizens, flying the American flag, bought in any port of the world. But that is not the purpose of this bill. The gentleman himself said that American ships could not get American insurance, as shown by the testimony before his committee.

Now, whose crops are we attempting to move? The crops of the people of America, in British ships to some extent, but they can not furnish all the tonnage that is required. The gentleman from Minnesota himself told you yesterday that the crops were not being moved because the exchange between this country and foreign countries had not yet been arranged. There is some movement, of course, but there will be a greater demand for moving crops. But I made the statement yesterday, and I repeat it to-day, that American ships are lying in American harbors with American cargoes that can not move because they have not insurance, and you would make them give way to British ships and British insurance rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended, because I want him to read a telegram just received.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] to read the telegram himself.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the gentleman from Illinois will yield for the reading of the telegram.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the secretary of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], who is now sick and unable to attend on the floor of the House, brought this telegram from Mr. AUSTIN for consideration of the committee. It is addressed to him by James A. Farrell. It reads:

Hon. RICHARD AUSTIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The American steel industry is suffering in its export trade owing to lack of over-sea transportation, and Government war-risk insurance is essential to restoring such transportation. The bill permitting American registry of foreign-built ships will be ineffective unless the Government war-risk-insurance bill is promptly passed. Will you not lend your great influence to its prompt passage as a national necessity?

JAS. A. FARRELL.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield to the gentleman, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, but I do not want to trespass on the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether Mr. James A. Farrell is not one of the men who signed the petition that came from the American Chamber of Commerce requesting this legislation, and whether he is not the president of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand he is the same gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman this further question, whether it is not a fact that the Standard Oil steamers, carrying the Standard Oil products, are now being held up in some of the ports of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know as to that. What is the gentleman's attitude? Does he take offense because Mr. Farrell takes this position in regard to this legislation?

Mr. MOORE. I take the attitude because it has been the policy of the majority to denounce such men as Mr. Farrell, and now it appears that this legislation is brought in here largely at his suggestion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is the gentleman opposed to this policy?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I am opposed to it because I do not believe there is any reason for the United States taking any such risks as this and venturing the people's money in such a hazardous enterprise.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the gentleman's opinion is the United States Steel Corporation a legitimate industry?

Mr. MOORE. It is a legitimate industry, no doubt, but the question is whether this House, which claims to be legislating only for the benefit of the people, should in this instance legislate in the interest of Mr. James A. Farrell and the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that this debate, so far as this paragraph is concerned, is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and has been for some time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman, but I do not want the time to be taken out of the time that belongs to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MANN. What is the date of that telegram?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is not dated.

Mr. MANN. Well, undated telegrams are not worth much.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I simply discharged what I understood to be a courtesy to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] in reading it.

Mr. MANN. I read a later telegram myself the other day from Mr. Farrell.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Since there is no date to this, how does the gentleman know his is later?

Mr. MANN. I know, because I think I received a copy of the same telegram several days ago from Mr. Farrell, as I received telegrams from these other people who did not know what the war insurance bill was, before it was introduced.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is questioning me in regard to a question of fact about which I have no knowledge.

Mr. MANN. I called the turn on you as to the date of the telegram, though, did I not? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I started out with the idea that I would like to see some bill passed to facilitate the movement of the crops of the country, but I do not believe that this bill will help the movement of the crops at all. I think that this bill will simply help to get the country into trouble.

We are appropriating $5,000,000 to organize an insurance company in the Treasury Department of the United States, which insurance company when organized will be a private institution, but nevertheless will be understood everywhere to be the Government itself. While England has been said to insure all war risks, England is in a different attitude from this country. England is a belligerent. We are a neutral Nation. We ought not to do anything whatever in the performance of our duty that will in any wise jeopardize the neutrality of the United States. The ships to be loaded with cargoes which can not move are not being held because of want of insurance. They are being held because the Bank of England is issuing emergency notes. They have suspended the gold reserve.

The rate of exchange between New York and London is so high and the value of the money issued by England is so doubtful, and will continue to be so doubtful until the outcome of the war is known, that nobody wants to take the risk of sending his goods across the sea without knowing what will be the value of the money he is to receive in exchange.

The establishment of this bureau in the Treasury Department will in no wise remedy the difficulties of exchange. Ships are more abundant than cargoes. Cargoes can not be had by the ships that are looking for them. The passage of this bill will not in any wise remedy that difficulty, and the difficulty will not be remedied until we have some assurance as to what the rate of exchange will be and what is the value of money that is to be paid for these cargoes; and until there is some definite information as to what the probable outcome of the war is to be, this uncertainty as to the money value will still continue.

America ought to continue neutral. It ought not to do a thing that will jeopardize that neutrality. This bill, if enacted into law, will, in my judgment, be one of the most certain acts we can commit to disturb the feeling of safety among the American people. The American people are patriotic. They want their Representatives here to maintain the peace of the Nation. They do not want in any wise to be identified, directly or indirectly, with this war abroad. The American people are courageous. They are not afraid to fight. But there is no need for us who speak for them to jeopardize the peace and prosperity of the country by the enactment of any law that will in any wise promote any chance of the Government mixing in anything that may by any possibility bring this Nation into trouble. The Government itself ought not as a neutral nation to enter upon any such enterprise as this.

I yield to no man, Democrat or Republican, in my loyalty to the American flag. There ought not to be, and I believe there is not, any politics on this floor in the consideration of any legislation designed to alleviate the conditions which exist on account of the war abroad. Every man here stands as an American, whether he be a "little American" or a great American; and I would rather be considered a "little American" and do the thing that my conscience tells me will safeguard the peace and honor of the American people than to be considered a great American and do the thing that may lead them into possible war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the formal amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman want five minutes?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. I want to get some information from the gentleman from Alabama, and I hope I may get it in five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] may have five minutes, and that at the end of five minutes the debate on this section close.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the debate on this amendment has closed now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know that.

Mr. BUTLER. I am obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I just want it understood that at the end of five minutes the Clerk shall read.

Mr. BUTLER. When the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made his forceful speech yesterday I had hoped that he would have time to permit some interrogatories to be put to him. I wanted to ask him where these ships are. I wanted to ask him what they are loaded with, and I wanted to ask him who owns them. But inasmuch as the gentleman in the course of his remarks did not have time to answer the question put to him by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I assumed that he would have no time for me. Therefore I made it my business to inquire of the highest authority this morning where these ships are, what they are loaded with, and who owns them. I went to the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation in the Department of Commerce, and was there told by the chief that they had no information to give me, because they had none beyond that which they had learned from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his remarks made in the House and the interview which he had had with Mr. James E. Farrell a few days ago.

In referring to Mr. Farrell, I speak of him as a friend. I have no objection to the United States Steel Corporation, and I have done nothing in this House knowingly to injure any legitimate business. Therefore what I say is not intended to reflect upon or to incite any feeling of opposition to Mr. Farrell or the business interests which he represents. He is one of the greatest giants in his line of business in the United States. But if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can tell me without accusing me of being un-American, I ask him to tell me where these ships are, what they are loaded with, and who owns them? His general statement does not satisfy me. I must have the particulars. I desire to vote with the gentleman when I think he is right, whether he charges me with being un-American or not. I do not care for his opinion. I do not ask anyone to certify to my Americanism. [Applause.] But I would rather that American bins should be filled than American graves. I prefer panics to wars; that crops should rot rather than human bones. I want it understood in this House—and I may have occasion to refer to it hereafter—that I enter my solemn protest against anything this House may do or propose to do that will tend to complicate us with these belligerent nations who are now shocking the sense of humanity the whole world over.

Why should we take the risk? Let me ask the gentleman why should we pass this law? What necessity is there for it? Its wisdom is doubted by almost every man in this House, even the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. If I had not been convinced before, I would have been convinced after hearing him. Now, cotton is not contraband; it can be carried; it needs no insurance. Wheat is contraband, and it can not be carried without risk. When the belligerents grow hungry, let them come to be fed. If we take their markets while they are in battle, we will naturally excite their ill will toward us. Let the American market man restrain his ambition for greater profit until danger to his country is passed. Let us confine the trade to American coasts and thereby increase our own safety. I will not vote for any measure or provide any means to help anybody to help himself or to assist in transporting questionable goods to any of these belligerent ports at this time. I wish here and now to make it known that no charge of poor Americanism or lack of proper American spirit can tempt me to alter my fixed purpose and to the best of my poor ability to keep my country out of a war.

Of course my timidity and apprehension may render me subject to the charge that I am a poor specimen of an American citizen, but if so I will make an effort to live it down. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama be given five minutes in which to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] on the question of the location of these ships and the character of their cargoes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will answer, if there is any answer needed, when another paragraph has been read. I am more anxious to pass this bill than to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I have already stated where my information came from and where the ships are.

Mr. MOORE. It would help us very much in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The information is in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the said bureau of war-risk insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable, make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war, whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by adding the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power, in his discretion, to extend the provisions of this act to marine risks, if he shall find that the rates charged therefor are excessive and tend to prevent export commerce."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes to explain the facts which lead me to offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, this is an emergency measure, according to the explanation of its supporters. What is the emergency? It is the alleged fact that insurance for the risks of war are not adequately provided by private concerns; or, stating it in another way, that these private concerns ask from the shippers prohibitive rates. Prohibitive rates would visit the same effects on our commerce that no insurance would visit. The emergency is therefore a question of the economic charges which our export commerce can bear and move.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman, but I ask him to make his question short, as my time is limited.

Mr. MADDEN. I will. Does the gentleman not think that there is a great possibility of the ships insured by this bill charging greater freight rates than they ought to charge; and if we insure them, ought not the Government to see what the freight rates are before issuing the insurance?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I can not go into that question now. Now, on the question of insurance rates this commerce has two kinds of risks to meet. The first is the risk that is denominated the perils of the sea. Do these insurance companies act under motives which may make those rates prohibitive? With regard to the risk of perils of the sea the bill leaves this commerce to the marine companies, as now organized, and the question is presented, May they not in this contingency exact rates that will prove equally prohibitive with their war-risk rates in the movement of our commerce? Gentlemen, as bearing on that subject I want to refer you to some facts which are, it seems to me, of momentous importance. One fact is this: In the year 1911 the marine insurance companies of the United States collected from our shipping a little more than $4,500,000 for insurance. They paid back in losses a little less than $1,500,000. In short, for performing the function of collecting $1 from the average of commerce and paying it to the unfortunate owner of ship and cargo they exacted $3. I shall append to my remarks the statistics of both sides of the ocean for a number of years.

They exact a rate of 300 per cent for the actual risk involved. That figure is not exceptional. When you consult marine insurance experience on the continent of Europe, you find in that same year 378,000,000 marks collected with an insurance loss of 135,000,000 marks, and that state of affairs characterizes the normal operation of the marine-risk insurance of this and other countries.

I want to say to the gentlemen of the House that under these circumstances if figures like these characterize private marine insurance in times of peace our commerce may be in grave peril in time of war, because under the provisions of this bill the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury would be effectually tied from extending the kind of insurance which might, indeed, be most strenuously required.

The amendment that I have offered simply provides that if the Secretary of the Treasury finds that the rates for marine insurance are excessive and such as to prevent the movement of export traffic, then he shall have the power to extend the provisions of this bill, not permanently and forever, but temporarily, to cover the marine risk as well as the war risk.

Gentlemen of the House, there are other reasons why this subject should be given entire to the hands of the administrative authorities. If we leave them only the war risk, what are we going to find? I fear we will find that the ingenuity of the shipper will discover those particular occasions when the boat and cargo are in probable danger and insure only those risks, and with reference to the other shipments, where there is no danger, there will be no insurance premiums paid and nothing to go to the Federal fund to meet the disasters expected.

But if the Secretary of the Treasury is given the right to discharge the entire function during this period of our terrific emergency, then the income to the fund to meet the occasions of loss and indemnification will pour down in general averages as rains from the sky from lucky and unlucky commerce, and we will have a fundamental average to support the fund against the maximum of losses.

I know how much prejudice there is with regard to the Government engaging in what they call private business. Gentlemen, the marine insurance of the United States can not look a business man in the face and say that it represents private business. A concern that methodically, in season and out of season, collects $3 for every one it pays back in losses is not entitled to be dignified with the name of private business, to say nothing of the fact that these marine concerns are in the form of a trust and completely monopolize the business.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I have performed what I esteem to be a duty this afternoon. I am not propagandizing to this House. I say that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Government of the United States, is entitled in this emergency to collect the premiums as well as to pay the losses of insurance on our foreign commerce. The Secretary of the Treasury can surely be trusted to employ this amendment if he finds that the exigencies of our commerce justify and require it.

The bill still retains the clause providing for the repeal or suspension of the act when the war emergency is over. Meanwhile, it seems to me that when we go into the saving of commerce we have a right to think of the farmer who has to pay an extra cent a bushel on his wheat to pay for marine insurance. I repeat that they are not entitled to the considerations that extend to competitive private business, because their management of marine insurance is reeking with waste and is simply a challenge to economic organization and business efficiency wherever it may exist. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen have to-day tried to extract from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] information, but without success. The gentleman from Alabama states that all along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and Pacific coast American vessels are lying loaded in ports afraid to depart for lack of war-risk insurance. Where are they going to? There are no American vessels to speak of in the foreign trade. Can it be possible that the owners of American vessels are so fearful of the present administration that they are afraid to sail along the coast in the coastwise trade? I do not think they have reached that point of pusillanimity. I will say that I do not believe the gentleman from Alabama can name a single case, not one, which bears out his statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois does not desire to misinterpret what I said, if anyone else does. It is in the RECORD. I said I had received the information from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and he urged me on that account to push the passage of this bill, and I am satisfied that the Secretary of the Treasury would not have so informed me if he had not been advised to that effect.

Mr. MANN. I heard the gentleman make the statement to-day himself. He made the statement himself that this was the case.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated yesterday, and it is in the RECORD, that the Secretary of the Treasury had advised me to that effect, and I now state that it is to that effect, and call attention to what the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILSON] informed me while I was making the statement about vessels in his own port.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman made the statement yesterday, he ought by this time to have secured the information. If the Secretary of the Treasury yesterday had information known to anyone else in the world that all along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and Pacific coast laden American vessels were waiting in port afraid to depart, God knows he ought to be able to furnish some specific instance. I deny that that is the fact.

I called to the attention of the House the other day what the situation is. I called the attention of the House the other day to the fact that three weeks ago, within a day or two, this House passed a bill for the purpose of allowing American registry to foreign-built vessels; that nearly two weeks ago that bill was agreed to by the Senate after they had rejected a conference report; that the regulations which the President is to make under that bill are not yet made; and that a great many foreign-built ships, owned practically by Americans, were asking to have the regulations put into force so that they could take out an American registry. I read a telegram from Mr. Farrell, whose telegram has been read this morning, stating—

> We are patiently awaiting issuance of proclamation in order to be in an intelligent position as to whether we can put these steamers under American flag immediately and operate them competitively with steamers in over-sea trade under other flags, as our steamers are being held in various ports at very heavy expense. Would appreciate advices as to about when information will be available to enable us to determine what to do.

These are foreign-built vessels flying a foreign flag. We propose to give them the American flag. More than a week ago the bill went to the President for his signature, and was signed, I believe, more than a week ago. He has the power to make the regulations. The regulations have not been made. These vessels are being held in port because they want to take out an American registry, and they can not do so owing to the lack of something on somebody's part connected with the departments or with the administration.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly patent to anyone that American vessels are not waiting in port for a war-risk insurance bill, because we have practically no American vessels in the foreign trade. Those few which are in the foreign trade are now making their regular sailings and have been since the war commenced. Those American vessels in the coastwise trade are not waiting in port for war-risk insurance. The man is silly who thinks there is any war risk about sailing from Galveston to New York along the American coast, unless in the wildness of his imagination he has reached the point where he thinks this country is engaged in war. Is it possible that this bill is upon the theory that we are soon to be at war with some other country? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday used considerable language about being willing to defend the flag abroad on our vessels. Well, we are all willing to do that, but we do not want to be in a position where we have to fight for the flag or anything else at the present time. We want to keep out of war. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, let me call the gentleman's attention to the remark of the gentleman from Alabama yesterday about shots being fired across the bows of these ships.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was absent from the Chamber yesterday when the gentleman from Alabama made his speech, having some fun with the dentist, so did not hear it, and did not read it until a moment ago, when, understanding that the gentleman said that he had inserted in the RECORD a list of these vessels, I looked at the speech of yesterday, but did not find the list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is misquoting me again.

Mr. MANN. I said "understanding" that the gentleman said that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that.

Mr. MANN. I know that, but I have no doubt——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The RECORD shows what I did say and where I got the information, and I object to the gentleman putting any language of that kind in my mouth.

Mr. MANN. I did not put language in the gentleman's mouth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the gentleman says that I said I put a list in the RECORD, he did put language in my mouth.

Mr. MANN. Oh, if the gentleman will just sit still for a moment, he will be better off. The gentleman is very touchy this week, since his war resolution of last Tuesday. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] He has been cussed by so many men so strongly that it has got on his nerves a little bit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. But the gentleman from Alabama is anxious to have this House do business, which the gentleman from Illinois is not.

Mr. MANN. That is an untrue statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not untrue.

Mr. MANN. I would not say that it is a falsehood, because that would not be parliamentary language.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not untrue.

Mr. MANN. It is untrue.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not. The gentleman has conducted a filibuster here for weeks against the legitimate business of the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is making another untrue statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall not indulge in unparliamentary language, but the gentleman can not put language of that kind into my mouth.

Mr. MANN. I do not endeavor to put any language into the gentleman's mouth. In looking over the gentleman's speech, in looking for the list that was not there, I found this language:

> Days ago unanimous consent was asked in this House for the consideration of this bill, and objection came from the leader of the minority party, clearly, from what I have heard to-day, voicing the un-American sentiments of his own party.

Mr. Chairman, that statement is untrue in its inference. It is true that I objected to the then consideration of the bill, but when the gentleman from Alabama, dealing in what he does not often deal in, cheap and very cheap demagogy, endeavors to say that any party in this House is un-American, with the present crisis in the world and the present situation of this country in the world, when he says that any party is un-American in this country, he is descending to the very lowest depths of nonsense and silliness and untruthfulness. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am surprised that the gentleman from Alabama, usually cool and affable, should undertake to say that the Republicans of this House or the Progressives of this House are un-American because they do not happen to agree with him on a certain bill. Mr. Chairman, it does not need denial——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. MANN. It does not need denial from me when he says that I am un-American. I am quite willing to put my Americanism and my record of it at any time against that of the gentleman from Alabama. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois endeavors to hide his doubtful position by inaccuracy of statement. I have not charged the gentleman from Illinois with being un-American. I charged his party with being un-American in their action upon this bill, and I said yesterday that when the gentleman objected to the unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill he was evidently acting in harmony with his party, and I say it now. You may criticize this bill as much as you please. You may say that there is no necessity to insure American ships carrying the American flag. You may pretend to say that this bill will endanger our peaceful relations with Europe, but when you say it you know that it is not true. There is nothing in this bill that will provide our ships against a war risk that would change their condition one iota, if they were insured by a private company instead of by a bureau of the American Government, and to say that there is is cheap claptrap. I do say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and to his party, that the American people are facing a commercial crisis, one of the most serious commercial crises that this country has faced since the Civil War, brought about by conditions over which they have no control; and when the President of the United States, occupying his high office, a man whom everyone in this country knows if he erred at all would err on the side of peace rather than on the side of belligerency, a man of high character and standing, approved by the American people from ocean to ocean [applause on the Democratic side]—when he says that this simple bill should be passed, a bill that can put in question only a few millions of the people's money, that can work no injury except possible injury to those insurance companies of foreign countries who are temporarily taken out of this country and who want a vacuum left for their business when they choose to come back again—when he says, under the authority of his high office, that it is necessary to pass this bill and pass it at once in the interest of the American people, in the interest of the American commerce, when I say that the party and the leadership on this floor that would delay by parliamentary methods the passage of this bill, attempt to prevent it going on the statute books to relieve the situation that the President of the United States thinks is an emergency, I say now and I will continue to say that that party and that leadership is un-American. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, it fell to my lot on yesterday to make the first observations made upon the floor on this bill. I am a Republican. I announced that the bill was not, in my judgment, a subject for partisan consideration. I had on the day before attended a meeting of the Committee on Rules and voted for a rule to expedite the passage of the bill because the President of the United States had been reported as saying there was an emergency for its consideration. I made the first observations, as I say, on the subject of the bill itself. I announced then that with some misgivings I would support the bill. I resent, therefore, the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday and repeated again to-day that the party of which I am a member is un-American or that I as a member of that party am un-American. I repeat——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman can clearly understand that my remarks could not apply to him when he is supporting the bill. It is to those who are trying to use parliamentary tactics to prevent its passage to whom they apply. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not allow myself to be put outside of that party by simply supporting what I regard as a nonpartisan measure at a time when the President of the United States says there is an emergency for its consideration, and I regret exceedingly the leader of the majority upon the floor has made of a measure that ought not to have been considered from a partisan standpoint at all a real partisan measure. Notwithstanding the attitude of the gentleman from Alabama I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to know the parliamentary status.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, to which the gentleman from New York reserved the point of order. Does the gentleman from New York insist on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, no request has been made that the Government provide marine insurance for American vessels and cargoes. If the statement be true that a large portion of the cotton crop is to be held over until next season, and that at least four and a half million bales will not be exported that would be under other conditions, the amount of marine insurance to be done will be so greatly curtailed that the marine underwriters will be overanxious to secure marine insurance or war-risk insurance. Whatever justification there may be for the Government to underwrite war risks on American ships at this time there seems to be none whatever to extend it to the underwriting of the ordinary marine risks. Under such circumstances, I am unwilling that such a provision should be incorporated in the bill. This bill deals with war risks; they are entirely distinct from marine risks, and I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I have not heard anything on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point of order was that the amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, what are we dealing with here to-day? We are dealing with the subject of marine insurance; and war risks are a part and parcel of marine risks, because they occur to marine subjects and only under marine circumstances. The bill as it now stands would detach, as it were, an arm simply from the body of marine insurance. The subject of marine insurance, Mr. Chairman, embraces war risks as well as ordinary perils of the sea. It is one subject; it is one organic fact; the policy that covers it is one policy and the agency which deals with the subject is one agency. It is one thought and one theme and one situation, and, on the argument of germaneness, if perils of the sea are not germane to war perils of the sea, then I know of no standard of germaneness that is intelligible to the human intellect. Now, with reference to the exigencies——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair only wants to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The Chair heard the other gentleman on everything but the point of order, and I wanted to answer him.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course if the gentleman wants to speak on the merits of the bill——

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with one organic subject, the subject of marine insurance, and any element of marine insurance is germane to this bill, because its subject is marine insurance and the particular incidents of marine insurance. I should like the Chair to give careful thought to this proposition before he sustains the objection of the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the bill creates——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This bill is a bill for the purpose of providing a bureau in the Treasury Department for war-risk insurance. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] provides not only for war-risk insurance but for insurance against any danger which might be incurred at sea from wind or tide. It would authorize this bureau to insure ships in the coastwise trade, and to the Chair it is very clear that the bill is not intended to be so wide in its scope, and therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is not germane to the purposes of the bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, for information——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland (continuing). From the Chair. What do I understand the rule of germaneness to be?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has given his ruling, and if it has not been understood by the gentleman the Chair is sorry. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Page 2, line 17, after the word "terms," insert:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any vessel, its freight, passage money, or cargo, subject to seizure under the provisions of the declaration concerning the laws of naval warfare, done at London, England, on the 26th day of February, 1909, and duly signed by the accredited representatives of the United States."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the point of order disposed of immediately, if it is subject to a point of order. I do not think it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman wanted to make a speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do wish to speak to the amendment with the idea of having it adopted, because I think it will safeguard the interests of this country as to getting involved in foreign warfare.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the amendment as it was read from the Clerk's desk, it is an effort to make a declaration in this bill of the law of neutrality—the law of nations. Well, now, I do not differ with the view of the gentleman from Wisconsin in reference to this matter, but I do not believe it would be wise to attempt to make a declaration in this bill of what the law of nations is and commit ourselves to the declaration, but leave the prize courts of the world to decide the law as they find it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman now argue on the merits rather than the point of order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the reason I make the point of order. Now, as to the point of order, this question is one of granting insurance. The declaration there is as to what contraband of war might be, which clearly is not germane to the question of granting war insurance. The question of what contraband of war may be, Mr. Chairman, in the last analysis, is a question for a prize court to determine.

The CHAIRMAN. Allow the Chair to say to the gentleman from Alabama that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin simply puts a limitation on what cargoes, freights, and so forth, can be insured under this bill. Why is it not germane?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if it is written in the way of a limitation, I suppose it would be. Of course, I only heard it read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose was entirely a limitation on the character of insurance that might be undertaken by the Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is not the proper construction of this amendment rather that of a classification than a limitation? For example, if the Chair will look at page 2, line 24, it there provides for rates subject to change to each port and to a class, thereby classifying and defining the risk.

Now, all that this amendment does is to classify the risks covered by this bill exactly as does that line which I called to the attention of the Chair. This amendment classifies the risks which the law of the nations makes perilous and those which are not perilous; those which are subject to a high risk and rate and those that are subject to a low risk and rate, exactly as line 24 indicates. For that reason it seems to be very clear that the amendment of the gentleman is in order, if line 24 is in order, and, of course, that is the very essence of the bill, and is admittedly in order. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] discussed the merits of the proposition. Unless some of these risks can be included and others can be excluded by amendment, then, of course, there is no use of trying to amend anything. It is the very object of an amendment to clearly define the application of the measure. This amendment accomplishes just that thing and nothing else.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, without fear of being classed as un-American, at least by my constituents, I rise to submit this amendment in all good faith as a patriotic, loyal American from a northern State. [Applause on the Republican side.] My discussion yesterday, when I was arguing along this line, was not prompted by any motive other than the highest of patriotism, and I think it ill became the leader of a great party to charge me as having been one who was prompted by unpatriotic motives when my sole and only purpose was to try to prevent this country from becoming involved in the European war.

The purpose of the amendment that I submit to-day is to safeguard the interests of this Government, so that no Secretary of the Treasury—not the President, but no Secretary of the Treasury—and no subordinate under him may involve this Government in war, and that we may not undertake as a war risk that which is known and established by all the maritime powers of the world in the declaration of the naval conference of London in 1909 as not permissible, namely, a belligerent merchant vessel after hostilities begin can not be transferred to the nationality of a neutral power when its purpose is obviously to evade the consequences of being seized as a prize by another belligerent.

The very purpose of the meeting in London in 1909 that, without reservation, agreed upon these articles was that there might be some established principles for the international prize court to follow in prize cases that were to be established as suggested at the second Hague conference, rather than to be allowed to grope around and follow the general principle suggested at the Hague conference of justice and equity. It was the purpose, as stated in the initiatory letter of Earl Grey, when he invited all the signatory powers that he deemed it advisable, for all the powers to have some defined, clearly expressed principles of international law on certain important subjects where the views of some of the countries were not in agreement that would guide that prize court in making its decisions.

Those principles have been now established. One of them is that a belligerent merchant vessel can not, after hosilities have begun, with the purpose of evading the seizure as a prize by another belligerent, cover itself under a neutral flag. It is being proposed and mooted by our officials here at Washington that these very belligerent vessels to-day should come under the American flag and involve us in a dispute at least, perhaps in war, with foreign nations. We read yesterday where the French ambassador, Mr. Jusserand, had served notice on the Secretary of State that he could not allow the German merchant vessels to be transferred to American registry, as it would be violative of their established principles of more than 100 years and of their understanding of international law.

Now, we are desirous on this side, and it does not need any public exposition of that fact, to assist the administration in its every endeavor in this great crisis that confronts the country, but we are also prompted with a higher motive and higher purpose that we should, first, as a duty to ourselves, protect ourselves and keep ourselves aloof from all foreign entanglements. And if there is going to be any policy adopted here that will even tend to entangle us, I for one, as an American, will cry halt, and I will have no apology to make to my constituents for protesting against that policy that I conscientiously believe may tend to bring us to the brink of war. We should do no act that will cast in the minds of any belligerent Government even a suspicion of favoritism. If we maintain a high, lofty, and commanding position of strict neutrality to all in conflict, we will strengthen our power apd influence abroad so as to use with telling effectiveness our good offices for the settlement, when the time arrives, of this dire catastrophe.

The amendment that I have offered is for the maintenance of absolute neutrality. Germany and her allies can not then complain of our Government assisting Great Britain in the conveyance of needed foodstuffs, nor can France in turn complain that the money from the sale of German merchant vessels should not be used as a succor to her enemies.

Adopt this amendment and you give certainty to the powers that may be exercised by the Treasury officials, so that our Government will not become a shield to dubious practices of private parties in violating the accepted principles of international law. Our one controlling thought should be to do naught that will involve or tend to involve us in the European conflict. Adhere to strict neutrality and our future is secure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not in opposition. I had hoped, however, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would have given some others an opportunity to talk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I would like to say a few words in opposition to the amendment. Suppose we agree that the debate on the amendment close in 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I would like five minutes of that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then say 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we can not agree upon reasonable debate I think it should be left for the House to determine.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I hope the gentleman will not put his motion in that form.

Mr. ADAMSON. I simply want to curtail somewhat an endless debate.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I think this has not been an endless debate. I think these amendments are important enough to warrant at least a few minutes' debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I modify that, Mr. Chairman, and move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks to amend his motion and moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE. I want to interrogate the gentleman from Georgia for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has made a privileged motion.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman made a statement yesterday which I took in good faith. He said he did not want to abridge the right of debate. I have not spoken to-day. I have a few amendments here which I think should be considered. I have had no opportunity to offer either of them as yet.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will be glad to hear the gentleman's amendments, Mr. Chairman, and I am always glad to hear the gentleman speak and I am sorry he has not spoken lately.

Mr. MOORE. I remember distinctly that the gentleman stated yesterday that there would be full opportunity for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is that the gentleman's motion?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I accept that.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman give me five minutes on one amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia accepts the amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the gentleman's motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], it is to declare what is contraband of war and to say that no insurance shall be placed on contraband of war.

Now, I am in thorough accord with the view that this insurance should not be given on contraband of war. I have not the slightest idea that this bureau for one moment will insure contraband of war. I would not be in favor of a bill that intended to insure contraband of war. But I want to say that the gentleman's amendment should be defeated, because this is no time for us to determine what is contraband of war. In the first place, it is beyond our power to determine what is contraband of war. Contraband of war is determined by the compacts of nations and the understanding of nations. It is determined by international law; in other words, and we can not make it any more than foreign nations can make the law as to what is contraband of war.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman explain while he is on this point how this amendment declares what is and what is not contraband of war? I understood that it simply accepted what should be determined as contraband of war by some other power than Congress, and provided that that should not be insured.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not heard the amendment read at the desk, and I have not seen it, and I may be mistaken as to the contents of the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read it in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "terms," insert "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any vessel, its freight, passage money, or cargo, subject to seizure under the provisions of the declaration concerning the laws of naval warfare, done at London, England, on the 26th day of February, 1909, and duly signed by the accredited representatives of the United States."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment does attempt to determine what is contraband of war. As I understand, this compact that is referred to in this amendment was signed up by the representatives of certain nations, but was not finally agreed to. It is true that some of the nations agreed to it, but Great Britain vetoed the agreement. I understand that within the last few days she has signified her desire to become a party to it, but this would attempt to take out of the State Department—to take out of that part of the Government that is charged with the consideration of these matters—the determination of this very question of contraband of war, and by an act of Congress seek to tie the hands of the administration of this insurance bureau, to force upon this country a provision that the Government of Great Britain some time ago refused to agree to, and which now, since war has begun, she is asking this country to agree to.

Now, it may be right; I am not prepared to say that that proposition is right or wrong; but I am prepared to say that this Congress should not at this time attempt to make a declaration of whether it is correct or incorrect. It should be left to the wisdom of the State Department and not to the legislative branch of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa and Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment because it makes what I consider a bad bill somewhat less objectionable.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is not an emergency bill, for it has no emergency to meet. It is not an American bill, because it follows no American policy, and I challenge any gentleman to refute that statement.

What emergency is there of which any gentleman has given an account? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said that there are ships along our coast at various points—American ships, flying the American flag—that are unable to move across to Europe because they can not obtain marine insurance. I care not where the gentleman from Alabama got his information to that effect, it is not correct and can not be correct. We have in the European trade only half a dozen, or less, ships of the American Line—a line that was established by virtue of a law passed by a Republican Congress, I may say in that connection. Those ships are leaving in accordance with their prescribed dates. They have not stopped and laid in port, delayed by the want of any marine insurance, although they may not have sailed with a full cargo—as other ships, three in one day, have sailed without a full cargo—not because of lack of insurance, but because shippers could not be sure of getting their pay.

Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] stated that this was not a partisan measure, and he regretted that partisanship had been brought into this discussion. I agree that it is not a partisan measure, but I insist that the gentleman from Alabama is responsible for partisanship being brought into the discussion.

The gentleman from Illinois needs no defense at my hands, nor would I perhaps be adequate to give it if it were necessary; but it was not the gentleman from Illinois who introduced partisanship into this bill, where it has no place and has no real purpose. It was the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who charged the Members upon this side as being un-American and unpatriotic.

Mr. BUTLER. He charged the whole Republican Party.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and he charged that we were obstructing the passage of the bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] knows, as no one else knows so well, that the roll calls that are being asked here by Members on both sides are not by reason of any spirit of obstruction to the passage of this bill or its coming to a vote, but they are because he has introduced a rule to remedy a situation and the spirit of which no one has violated more than the gentleman from Alabama himself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That statement is not true. It is absolutely not true, and you can not state that in my face.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Hold on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. All I have to say is that the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought the gentleman's time had expired. The gentleman said that I had violated the rule in the matter of being absent from this House more than almost anybody in it, did he not? Is that what he said?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was just about to state in what manner, and if you will permit me I will state it now. I do not think you will deny it when I get through, whatever you may say at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will suspend. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen will please be seated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not, and I think when I get through the gentleman from Alabama, with whom I have always supposed I have stood on terms of friendship, will not differ seriously with me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All I have to say is that the gentleman may explain if he wishes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not yield to the gentleman from Alabama. My statement is simply this, that the purpose of these roll calls has been to keep men on the floor here, and the gentleman from Alabama, however busy he may have been in other duties, knows full well that he has not been on the floor here for a very large portion of the time, and there are few gentlemen in the House who have been here on the floor less than the gentleman from Alabama has been actually on the floor. Now, I was about to state that the gentleman from Alabama might give a very reasonable and excellent excuse for his not being here, that he was occupied with other duties, but so could the gentlemen who have been called here by the rule which the gentleman from Alabama has invoked. Now, that was just what I was about to say, and I regret that any difference has arisen between the gentleman from Alabama, to whom I do not yield, and myself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But before the gentleman occupies his three minutes I want three minutes in which to answer the statement which he has made, and then he can answer, if he pleases.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not intend to refer to the gentleman from Alabama any further.

Mr. BUTLER. Has objection been made?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended for three minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And that I may have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that to come out of the 30 minutes already agreed upon, or is it to go beyond it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To go beyond it. I do not want to interfere with that. I mean six minutes in addition to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may proceed for three minutes, and that then the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for three minutes, the six minutes being in addition to the time agreed upon heretofore by unanimous consent. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I was about to make certain observations on the charge made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the Members on this side were acting in an un-American and unpatriotic spirit in opposing this bill. I say the bill is not an American bill. It does not follow any American policy. It has not been the policy of America to do anything by subterfuge that it can not do in the open, and it has not been the policy of America to permit any foreign nation to impose upon its own lawful rights, and that is what this bill provides for. It is either for the purpose of insuring contraband of war or else it is not, one or the other. If it is for the purpose of insuring contraband of war, then it is for the purpose of violating the rights of other nations, and for that reason is more than likely to lead us into untold trouble. If it is for the purpose of insuring something that is not contraband of war carried in American vessels, then I want to say that we should insist on our own rights and permit no one to violate them. But no other nation threatens a violation of our rights. There is no occasion for this bill when we talk about insuring legitimate, honest risk. If there is any emergency, if there is any occasion for this bill at all, it is because some one wishes to evade international law and impose on the rights of other nations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] a moment ago stated that I had violated the rule as to absence from this House more than most of the Members in it, and then when I challenged it, attempted to explain it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been here almost continuously for three years. When other Members went home after the adjournment of the last Congress, I stayed here. Whilst this Congress was doing business I went home to vote one day. I got home on Saturday night, voted on Monday, and left on Tuesday. I was detained two or three days by reason of sickness in my family, and had to go to Florida for that reason. Later on, last summer I suffered from a very bad cold, which most of the Members on the floor of this House knew was a fact. I stayed here as long as I could, and finally, upon the order of two physicians, I went to the mountains and stayed there 11 days, when I came back, and I have been here continuously ever since. [Applause.]

I have been away from this House during that time—I am not referring to the time when we had an agreement not to do any business last summer, because we nearly all went away—but while the House was doing business my absence from here, except on account of sickness, which was only a short time, has been the two days I was at home when I voted.

Now, the gentleman complains that I am not always on the floor. I am always here when the roll is called, and I am always here when my party requires my presence or my vote. My room is just across the corridor from this Hall, as the gentleman well knows, and I am not out of this room because of my own desire. The time that I spend in my office is because gentlemen on the floor of this House desire to consult with me about the business of the House. [Applause.] It takes less than a half a minute or a quarter of a minute to come from that room in here, and I respond when a quorum is needed. I am ready here to transact the business of this House. What I complained of and had a right to complain of was that when it was necessary to transact the business of this House Members did not come here and make a quorum, but no such charge can be made as far as I am concerned. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Iowa may approve the idea that a Member of Congress while drawing his pay has a right to absent himself from the floor of this House and come back with the marks of the sea breezes on his hands and countenance, complaining that he is required to be here when he desired to draw $20 a day in his absence. That may be the high standard of political expediency that the gentleman from Iowa advocates, but I do not. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] should be adopted. It provides in substance that the list of contraband articles stated in the declaration of the international naval conference at London should be excluded from the operation of this bill. Our own State Department, by proclamation to our people, has already notified the country that Germany and Great Britain both have adopted in identical terms the definitions as to contraband and rules as to seizure concerning every article of goods set forth in the declaration of London. So that if the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin shall be adopted it will cover the exact articles shown to be contraband and agreed to be contraband by both Great Britain and Germany and by our own Government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have only five minutes, and I can not yield. Mr. Chairman, as I stated, this amendment covers the identical articles stated to be contraband not only by the declaration of London, but by England and Germany themselves, as have been officially promulgated to the American people by our Department of State. So there is an agreement now as to what constitutes contraband, and what would be excluded by this amendment. There can be no objection to it for indefiniteness, because all the interested nations have officially indicated exactly what it would cover and exclude.

The amendment should be adopted for this reason: It is the essence of the opposition to this bill, and if this amendment be adopted a very large part of the opposition to the bill would necessarily cease. The major part of the criticism to it would be adequately met. The opposition to the bill is for three reasons: First, it is deemed to be unnecessary either to move crops or to help our ships, and I think that such facts have been shown many, many times during this debate. Secondly, it tends to create a monopoly of marine insurance in the existing companies, and that contention can not be disputed, and there has not been any serious attempt to do so. Third, the principal ground of opposition and the principal reason why the amendment should be adopted is that this measure practically would constitute a violation of our boasted doctrine of neutrality and fair dealing between the belligerent nations. The ships going from the United States to belligerent nations must necessarily, from conditions of the control of the sea by Great Britain, operate solely in favor of one of the great contending parties, principally England and France, and against the interest of other contending parties, Germany and Austria. One can realize that as long as England controls the sea the ships which cross the sea will be for the benefit of England and its allies and against the other contending parties. Our ships and products can not serve the two hostiles equally and fairly because of such monopoly of the sea by Great Britain. That being true, this Government as a sovereign Government has no business by any official act to do anything which would prefer either or help the one or injure the other. The Government should not do either. Our people can sell and buy and trade and injure and give preference in that way, and no exception can be fairly taken to such acts. Not so with the Government itself. Its acts must not create a preference or advantage.

Now, there is one thing which this Government must do. It is due from us to humanity, it is due from us for our own self-respect and love for our fellow men, and it is due to all the other nations of the world that we should maintain, as we so loudly profess to do, our neutrality fairly, openly, honestly, without any technicalities or any possible evasion. [Applause.]

This bill does violate the spirit of neutrality, because it practically creates a preference to those nations which control the seas. But if this amendment be adopted, at once it notifies all the nations of the world, it notifies all the contending powers, that this bill and our public policy will not be adopted to benefit either of the contending powers, but that all will be treated alike and fairly by our Government in its official acts. All will be on an equality, so far as our Nation and its official acts are concerned. Without this amendment you do practically injure one of the parties; you do violate the spirit of neutrality; you are bound to create a feeling of resentment which will rise up to plague us hereafter. With this amendment we notify the nations of the earth that we intend to observe neutrality with the utmost fairness and the utmost humane spirit; and when the time shall come when this terrible conflict shall be ready for adjustment, the United States can stand, as it ought to stand, in a spirit of humanity, appealing to the great powers to cease this awful conflict, ready to receive and help all the other nations, all knowing that we will treat them fairly, that we like all equally well, that we are ready to do what we can for the benefit of all nations and all humanity. It is for that reason that this amendment ought to be adopted—to insure the neutrality of the people of the United States and notify the people of the world that so far as this bill is concerned, so far as our policy is concerned, all shall be treated equally and alike. [Applause.] This amendment will concern other nations even more than it will our own. It will serve notice upon them that no petty sentiment of greed or temporary advantage will swerve this great Nation from a position of fairness, where it can serve all when necessary. This Nation is the only one on earth which can fulfill this lofty mission. It is the only one to which the hostiles can look with confidence through their present rage and blood lust and agony. Let us not throw away this ideal position for a mess of pottage. Let not our desire for gain and greed obscure the ideals of our people or destroy their leadership toward peace on earth and good will toward men.

Mr. Chairman, that is the spirit of most of us who are opposing this bill. It is the true, the ideal American spirit, voicing the spirit of humanity, voicing the spirit of love for mankind, and not the greed of a dollar, not the bringing of mere lucre into the pockets of those who are greedy enough and low enough to impose upon the generosity of the American people at this time. [Applause.] The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has charged us with being un-American, because we dare to criticize this bill or seek to have it voice the real aspirations of our people. He is intent upon a measure which shall hunt the market places and seek advantage from the terrible necessities of our fellow men. He wants that somebody in this country shall make some money out of the terrors of this titanic struggle, and because we dare to point to our promises, to our duty, to our ideals, he charges us with being un-American. We can stand his epithets in such a cause. If we can lead the way for the other nations to have real and abiding confidence in us, if we can show them a genuine sense of fairness and duty and not merely groveling for material gain, we can assume and maintain the highest leadership, and that to me is the true American spirit. It is the spirit of my people, anyway. We, upon our part, on our side, sincerely want that this Nation, that our Government, shall stand with a love for humanity, notifying all of these contending nations that they may be confident that we will treat them all alike, and for that reason this amendment ought to be adopted to prove to them beyond recall the highest truth we profess. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any difference of opinion in this committee upon the subject of neutrality. Everyone of us believes in preserving the neutrality of this country. Everyone believes in preserving an impartial attitude toward the belligerent powers, but there are questions connected with this matter which have no relation to neutrality. Here, for instance, is the entire force of the German merchant marine disorganized—unable to engage in commerce. In every belligerent country to-day industry is stopped—in Germany, in France, in Great Britain—and so long as this war continues every industry must be stopped there. This creates a great responsibility, and there is no country in the world that can meet it except this country, and we must prepare to meet it. It can only be done by obtaining the necessary ships to carry our goods and our staples. It is not a question of to-day or of the present only; it is a question with most important consequences for the future. It is impossible to go to our shipyards now and build the ships with which to carry the commerce. We must get ships where we can find them, and many of them can be procured now at our very doors. When the gentlemen speak of neutrality there is always a covert reference to the purchase of foreign-built ships and to their use in the carrying trade. There is no trouble on that score. We must take care of the trade forced upon us and protect it. If we permit this opportunity to pass by unimproved, this country will not behold another equal to it in this generation or probably in this century. Great opportunity and great responsibility are before us. Have we the strength and courage to meet them?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, from the time of the introduction of this bill I have had very grave doubts as to its urgency or necessity. The proponents of the bill have failed utterly to show that at this time there is any need of legislation of this character. When called upon to state what American ships, if any, are now held in ports by reason of difficulty in securing war insurance, they have not been able to name one.

From the beginning I have doubted the wisdom of this legislation, because I fear it is liable to place us, as a nation, in a position likely to involve us in difficulty as one of the parties in contests and controversies before the prize courts of the world; and yet, in spite of these doubts and misgivings as to the necessity, as to the wisdom, as to the advisability of the legislation, I have been prepared to resolve those doubts in favor of the bill, in view of the fact that the administration, upon which we must depend to keep us on an even keel in our friendly neutrality with all the world, has seemed to be favorable to the legislation. Taking this view of the matter, I had hoped and expected to vote for the bill, if it were amended so as to make it clear we do not propose to encourage the carrying of contraband. I shall vote for it if this amendment carries, and I shall vote against it if this amendment does not carry, for if it does not, it will lay us open to the charge that what is sought is not the protection of American commerce in peaceful and legitimate trade, but the protection by the Government of those who desire to go forth as blockade runners and freebooters, loaded with contraband of war. There has been something said about true Americanism. The truest Americanism to-day is that Americanism which stands above all things for strict and honest neutrality, for the maintenance of a friendly neutrality with all of the warring nations, and if this amendment is voted down it will be because you have put the interests of a few possible blockade runners, the interests of a few rich shippers and shipowners who desire to deal in contraband, above the honor of the Nation and above the desire of our people to be entirely and honestly neutral in this great and lamentable conflict.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does not the gentleman believe that a contract of insurance will except blockade runners?

Mr. MONDELL. If this amendment is adopted, it will then be clear that all we propose to insure are the ordinary legitimate risks of neutral goods under a neutral flag. If you vote down this amendment, it will lay us open to the charge, if it does not make it clear to all the world, that it is not neutrality and friendship with all the warring powers that we seek, not an opportunity for honest and legitimate trade, but an opportunity to throw the protecting arm of the Nation around those who would violate the laws of neutrality and deal in contraband of war [applause on the Republican side], placing the wishes and the desires and the profits of a few shipowners, largely great corporations, above the honor and the dignity of this great neutral people in this time of world-wide war.

Mr. Chairman, I can not understand how any man who in good faith desires that the Government shall take whatever war risks there may be in neutral goods, in neutral bottoms, under a neutral flag—I can not understand how any man who desires the Government shall take over those ordinary war risks and none others—can vote against this amendment. With this amendment limiting the risks we are to take to those which as a neutral power we are justified in taking, we can join in the passage of the bill, even though we doubt its value or necessity. He who votes against this amendment declares himself by his act, whether or not that be his intent, the friend, protector, and well-wisher of those who in the hope of a profit of a few miserable dollars would barter our position as the friend of all these rival warring powers and would bring us from our high estate of a great neutral nation down to the low, miserable plane of a people seeking to make money out of the misfortunes arising out of the wars of Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the spirit of caution with which this legislation is approached, as evinced by this contraband amendment, and by gentlemen on the other side, even though they would deny us the same spirit of caution. It would be the gravest folly to involve ourselves needlessly in war; but let us analyze the subject and see just what the proposed amendment means. A vessel is insured. Let us suppose that it is captured. That does not end the transaction or determine the rights or relations of this Government to the matter. That vessel must then be taken before a prize court; and the capture resembles simply the process of garnishment or attachment in inland litigation, and the courts of admiralty of the capturing nation, not the capturer, determine whether the seizure is legally justified. Thanks to civilization, such courts all over the world so far have sustained the juridical character for rectitude and for honor in the application of the law to such cases. Before that prize court all parties have a hearing, all the facts have opportunity for presentation, and at length a judicial conclusion is reached; and, Mr. Chairman, the vital point, after all, is this—that conclusion, that decision, of the prize court is as final on the parties as the decision of our Supreme Court. War never has been waged in modern times by a disappointed nation over a prize court's decision; such a decision could not be casus belli; and there is no more reason now to expect that history is going to reverse itself and by the decision of such a court imperil our neutrality than there has been in the past. But how stands it under the proposed amendment? You could write no war-risk insurance under its provisions. In effect, it provides that no goods potentially contraband of war shall be insured. That would invalidate every policy when the goods were captured and condemned by a prize court. Therefore no shipper would take such a policy; no insurance would result. The function of writing a policy, Mr. Chairman, is an administrative function; it is the administrator, with his circumspection and knowledge of the special circumstances of the risk, who can know best when to issue a policy and what conditions should be inserted in that policy. We surely can not write safe policies in this Chamber in a half hour of heated controversy and debate. I am against the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MOORE. I send forward an amendment which I offer at this time. I understand this is the only opportunity I have to get the amendment in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act may apply to ships not of the United States operating under a time charter by a citizen of the United States bearing cargo from ports of the United States to foreign ports consistent with the provisions of this act."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, but I offer the amendment at the suggestion of one of my constituents, thinking that possibly it will help the majority if they pass the bill. So far as I have time, I desire to read my correspondent's reasons for presenting this amendment.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., August 14, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the fact that various boards of trade throughout the country have appealed to Congress to establish a bureau of war-risk insurance to be administered under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury so as to make it possible for ships under American registry to engage in the foreign trade.

In this proposal I am in entire accord, but I wish to call your attention to a phase of the situation which so far Congressmen have appeared to have overlooked. This is the situation arising out of the ownership, pro hac vice, by American citizens operating under time charter of steamships sailing under foreign flags.

Under the rule laid down by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, second circuit (New York), in the case of Clyde Commercial Co. v. The West Ind'a Steamship Co. (169 Fed. Rep., 275), the usual provision in the charter party—"The act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, rulers, and peoples, and all dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, machinery, boilers, and steam navigation, and errors of navigation throughout this charter party always mutually excepted"—does not absolve the American citizen owner by reason of a time charter from the obligation to pay charter hire.

If the time charter also contains the somewhat usual condition that no voyage be undertaken or goods shipped that would involve risk of seizure, the American citizen owning by time charter a foreign vessel would be obliged to pay hire money while the vessel was indefinitely tied up in port.

Under this state of law, therefore, it would seem to me that if the Government proposes making provision for insurance of American bottoms regard should also be had to the large number of American citizens who have vessels sailing under foreign flags under time charter, and who could immediately put them into service in carrying cargo to foreign ports if they could avail of the protection of war-risk insurance by this Government.

I am speaking for a number of American interests in calling your attention to this, and I hope you will be able to call the attention of Congressmen to the situation.

Very truly, yours, WILLIAM J. CONLEN.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I have been observing a situation on the Republican side of the House to-day that I believe is thoroughly laughable and amusing to the American people. They are to-day criticizing the President and pretending to want to keep us out of war. Just a short time ago that side of the House was criticizing the President to beat the band because he did not go to war with Mexico. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that the American people can not be deceived and can not be fooled by this character of cheap demagogy which you gentlemen are trying to play to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, and I think that if the language of the section to which it is directed is carefully read it would show to the supporters of this amendment that there is no necessity for the adoption of the same. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a reading of a part of it. After reciting that cargoes in American vessels may be insured as a war risk it closes with this language:

Whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

That provision in the bill makes this amendment absolutely unnecessary. Gentlemen on that side talk as if this insurance was to cover every kind of war risk on everything that may be offered. The discretion of this insurance and making the same is lodged by the language of the bill with the Secretary of the Treasury. He has the right to pass upon the risk if it is necessary to take the same, whether the Government ought to take the same, whether it is safe to take the same, or whether it is dangerous to take the same. He is one of the Cabinet officers under the greatest apostle of peace this country has ever produced—Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen upon that side of the House who but two months ago were criticizing the "watchful waiting" policy of President Wilson because he did not plunge this country into a war with Mexico in order that a few speculators in this country might reap a rich harvest, might exploit that battle-rent country, and garner riches because of its deplorable condition are to-day afraid that this great apostle of peace by this measure will plunge this great Nation into war with Europe. I can say to the gentleman that the history of the past of this man and his able Secretary of State is security of what the future will be; that they will steer clear of war in Europe as they have steered clear of it in the past, and they will move the bursting granaries of golden grain throughout the West and other parts of this country into the markets of the world. Ah, gentlemen, keep down a measure like this and you will enable the grain speculators of this country, the cotton speculators of this country, the meat speculators of this country, to take from the producers their products at nominal prices, hold them and sell them abroad at a later date for enormous sums. That is the policy that is threatened by the delay or the defeat of this measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

An emergency exists for the speedy enactment of this measure in order that arrangements may be made to transport our surplus into the markets of the world to supply the demand there created by the unfortunate conditions which surround them. The men who are to administer this law fully understand its purposes and the critical situation. They are equal to the task imposed in this matter and fully competent to handle it with sufficient diplomacy to avoid difficulty. Their records in the past demonstrate their capacity, and the American people have confidence that they will discharge the duties imposed with such ability as will preserve peace and promote commerce. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, leave is granted.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 72, noes 77.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. STAFFORD] reported that there were—ayes 78, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "cargoes" insert "not contraband of war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the bureau of war-risk insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to adopt and publish a form of war-risk policy, and to fix reasonable rates of premium for the insurance of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys and cargoes against war risks, which rates shall be subject to such change, to each port and for each class, as the Secretary shall find may be required by the circumstances. The proceeds of the aforesaid premiums when received shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TEMPLE and Mr. MOORE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] is recognized.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, a good deal is said here about the present status of the declaration of London in the law of Great Britain. I should like to have made this statement previous to the vote on the last amendment. The amendment just rejected provided that cargoes should be insured that were not contraband of war. I should like to call attention to a colloquy held here yesterday between the chairman of the committee which reported this bill and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], on page 14394 of the RECORD:

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman think this Government ought to insure the goods that are purchased by one of these belligerent nations? Would not that involve us at once with the others who had no interest in these goods?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Possibly that is true, and should we do so we would have the loss to pay, but I am not going to assume our Government will do any such thing.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman says it can be done under this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It may be broad enough to do it, but I assume that the regulations which will be made to carry out the terms of this bill will not include anything that is contraband of war.

The action taken just now indicates that the bureau of war-risk insurance will not refuse to insure contraband, for the committee has just refused to put such a provision in the bill. I think the committee is right. If the Government is going into this business, it ought to be free to insure contraband goods; that is, at least those of the class known as conditional contraband.

Now, turning to another subject, I should like to read an extract from an article published last April by Mr. James Brown Scott, Solicitor of the State Department, American delegate to the peace conference at The Hague in 1907, and one of the officers of the American Society of International Law, about the declaration of London. Of the work of the London confefence Mr. Scott says:

An agreement, called the declaration of London, dated February 26, 1909, upon the principles of law to be applied by the proposed court, in accordance with article 7 of the original convention, was reached. Like the original convention, it was also in the nature of a compromise. It met with the approval of the British Government, for it was signed by the delegates of that Government acting under instructions, as is the wont of diplomatic conferences, and it seemed at the time that it removed the objections to the ratification of the original convention and to the establishment of the prize court in so far as Great Britain was concerned. The Government considered it satisfactory, and introduced a bill in both Houses of Parliament modifying British practice in such a way as to meet the requirements of the prize court convention, as modified by the declaration of London. It passed the House of Commons, but failed in the House of Lords owing to the unexpected, bitter, and persistent opposition on the part of the public, so that the Government has up to the spring of 1914 ratified neither The Hague Convention nor the declaration of London.

Now, it is a mistake to say that Great Britain vetoed that declaration. Great Britain signed it, and the British Cabinet approved it. There is no ratification of a treaty in the Parliament, in either House, in Great Britain. Ratification is an executive act, according to the practice of the British Government, and is done by the Cabinet. The status of this declaration of London in British law is perhaps about what the status of the Colombian treaty would be—the treaty that promises $25,000,000 to Colombia—if it should be ratified by the Senate and the House should fail to make the appropriation of $25,000,000. That would be a treaty signed and agreed to by the ratifying power, but failing to go into operation because the legislation necessary to put it into operation failed to go through the House.

Mr. LEVY. But that is not international law.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am very well aware of that.

Mr. LEVY. International law——

Mr. TEMPLE. I refuse to yield any further. That is not international law, but the London declaration will, nevertheless, be a very influential document for the guidance of the prize courts. There will be abundant precedent for treating it as if it were international law. Italy in her recent war with Turkey put that declaration of London into operation in spite of the fact that it is not international law. France and Great Britain have both announced their intention to put it into operation, in spite of the fact that ratifications have not been exchanged. That which is the practice of the nations becomes international law. There is no other test of international law than the practice of the nations. International law is not enacted. When we want to know what it is we study the practice of the nations, and when a maritime power like Great Britain and another like France and another like Italy put this into practice, and we ourselves have committed this Nation to it by signing it, by ratifying it in the Senate, as we have done, we, too, are committed to it. The only reason that it is not the law of the United States is because ratifications have not yet been exchanged. The Senate has acted on it finally. This is as nearly international law as anything can be that is not sanctioned and made certain by long practice. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 18, 20, and 23, strike out the word "war" wherever it appears.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to eliminate the danger line if possible. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in the course of one or two of his speeches this afternoon——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to know whether that amendment is not subject to a point of order. I did not hear it read.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman says he did not hear the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. I insist on knowing what the amendment is in order to make a point of order on it if I desire to do so.

Mr. MOORE. I make the point of order that the Chair had already recognized me after the amendment had been read, and I had begun to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. This does not come out of the gentleman's time. The Chair will state that if the chairman of the committee states in good faith, or any other Member of the House so states, that he did not hear an amendment that he thinks is subject to a point of order, and desires to have it reread and make a point of order, the Chair will exercise his discretion.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I keep so busy telling folks whether I think we will vote or not in the next three weeks, that I am greatly disturbed about these things. I did my best to hear that, but people were talking to me. I want to know whether it is subject to a point of order, and if it is subject to a point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ADAMSON. I make the point of order against the amendment. It has been ruled on once. War risk is all there is in the bill.

Mr. MOORE. I desire to observe that the word "war" has not been stricken out except as a part of another sentence. The word "war" was stricken out in a manner that gave no opportunity to amend in the first paragraph that was under consideration. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] indicated yesterday, when we were all liberal in the matter of time, that he did not propose to limit any gentleman wishing to speak on this bill. I have waited four hours to speak on it, and now the gentleman wants to close debate on this in 10 minutes. I make a point of order that it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit an inquiry from the Chair there?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the difference in principle between this amendment that is proposed by the gentleman now and that which was ruled upon by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] while he was in the chair an hour or two ago?

Mr. MOORE. The difference is that war risks are an entirely different proposition from war. War risks involve the risks of war. War is war per se. There is a very decided difference between the two terms. Speaking of war, one would not dream of including insurance; but speaking of war risks, one would at once think of insurance, which is an entirely different proposition from war.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me a moment on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, which was ruled out of order, was an amendment, as I recall, to insert a new paragraph in a section. The pending amendment is to strike a word out of the bill.

Now, it is true that sometimes in the consideration of an appropriation bill it has been held that an amendment to strike out a word was subject to a point of order because that resulted in making an appropriation for a purpose not authorized by law. But I do not recall, in all of the decisions on parliamentary law which have been made and which I have happened to see, any decision to the effect that a committee could not strike out a word in a legislative bill. Whatever its effect might be, here is a legislative proposition before the House, not an appropriation bill, not restricted in any way by the provision of the rules concerning appropriations, but a general legislative bill, covering a legislative subject, and the motion is made to strike out a word. We could strike out the paragraph. No one could question that a motion to strike out the section is in order; likewise a motion to strike out a sentence of the section is in order; likewise a motion to strike out a word is in order.

Now, whether that changes the aspect of the bill does not make any difference. This is a legislative bill. As introduced into the House, or a similar bill introduced into the House, it did not cover passage money and cargoes. Now, no one would say that if this were a House bill pending, with a proposition to issue war-risk insurance on ships, it would not be in order to issue the same insurance on the cargo or on the passage money. That is a committee amendment to the House bill. Those amendments were inserted, as a matter of fact, in the consideration of the bill in the Senate. We are not obliged to take the bill in the form and substance, word for word, as reported from the committee. This is a legislative bill, subject to consideration and change by the legislative body.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on several occasions yesterday and to-day has referred to the Republican side of the House as un-American in dealing with this proposition, and he has fallen back very strongly on the statement that the President of the United States desired to have this bill passed.

Now, there has been no official word from the President of the United States on this subject. This House of Congress officially is in entire ignorance of any desire on the part of the President of the United States to have this bill passed. The newspapers have reported that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and a number of other very distinguished Democrats have been in consultation with the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury upon this subject, and the same newspapers have indicated that some of the representatives of the "big interests" of this country have also been in consultation with these same gentlemen with regard to the passage of legislation of this kind, notably the gentleman whose name has heretofore been derided on the other side of the House—Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, of New York.

I have no real fault to find with those now in power for conferring occasionally with those whom they used to denominate as "representatives of the special interests" or as malefactors, who "put their iron heel on the backs of the poor." It may indeed be well for the Democrats to fraternize with those whom they formerly scorned and denounced. But all that we have officially concerning this bill and the influences behind it is the statement of the gentleman from Alabama that after these conferences with these distinguished gentlemen the President of the United States desires to have it passed.

I am opposed to this bill because of its dangerous character as a war measure, and because it puts the Government of the United States into a private business of very great risk; and, in addition, because it takes the money of the people of this country and stakes it in a game of chance, as it were, against a risk of property loss at sea. Apparently the very gentlemen who brought it up to the White House and induced the Democratic leaders to introduce it here were themselves in great doubt about the position it would put the Government in, because the report of the marine committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, which sent the 62 distinguished gentlemen, headed by Mr. Seth Low, to the White House in behalf of this measure, indicated in their report to Mr. Low just what kind of risk we would be expected to run into. This committee, made up partly of marine insurance men, said:

Our committee has considered the suggestion that the United States Government should be urged to assume the war risk under some similar plan on American ships and their cargoes.

Without making any definite recommendation for or against such a plan, our committee would point out some of the difficulties which such a plan presents.

The English plan excludes entirely all risks on vessels to an enemy's country. The United States, to maintain its neutral position, must evidently have regard to its obligations to treat all belligerents alike. Under present conditions, however, a uniform rate for war risk on shipments to all of the contending powers must either be too high to be of any value on shipments to Great Britain, or too low to be at all adequate for insuring risks on shipments to Germany. Moreover, it would appear doubtful whether the United States Government could assume such insurance on contraband goods, and so facilitate the shipment of contraband goods, without giving serious offense to the belligerent powers.

Our committee does not feel that the United States Government would be warranted in embarking in an insurance business fraught with such possible complications and dangers, unless it should appear that American shipping has no other alternative, and that such Government insurance is absolutely necessary to enable American ships to compete on equal terms with British ships covered under the British war-risk insurance.

It would appear very "doubtful," say these gentlemen who brought this matter over from the money center of New York, whether the United States could take such insurance on contraband goods, the kind that it is proposed here to make the Government insure, without giving serious offense to the belligerent powers. This was the statement of the marine committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce, the very gentlemen who influenced the Democratic Party in this matter.

But the subcommittee, made up of their distinguished lawyers, went into the matter more in detail. They showed just what this proposition would mean to the insurance companies and just what it will mean to the people of the United States. Their whole report breathed of foreign entanglements and the desirability of landing a bad bargain on the Government. Here is the way they figure it out that the Government with the people's money should take over the risk and danger that private companies sought to avoid.

Says counsel for the committee:

The ordinary policy of marine insurance would cover war risks in addition to the usual fire and marine risks but for the following clause:

"Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war."

The risks thus excluded from the protection of an ordinary marine policy may be covered by a war-risk policy. The forms of such policies vary widely, but it is the general intent of all of them to cover such risks as are excluded from the ordinary marine policy by the terms of the foregoing warranty.

The principal risks of the owner of goods in a captured ship may be summarized as follows:

1. The cargo may be sunk with the ship or condemned by the prize court of the captor as enemy's goods or as contraband.

The loss is not covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

2. The goods may be lost or damaged by reason of the ship striking a mine or otherwise coming within the range of hostilities.

The loss is not covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

3. Goods released by the prize court as neutral may be damaged in the course of unloading, storage, or reloading.

Losses of this nature would not be covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

4. Extra charges and expenses in connection with forwarding released goods from the port of the prize court to their original destination would not be covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war-risk policy.

Here you have the proposition. The marine companies take the safe business; the hazardous or doubtful business is to be taken over by the Government. Gentlemen engaged in the insurance business would like to unload behind a fund taken from the Treasury of the United States.

Goods may be lost or damaged by reason of the ship striking a mine or otherwise coming within the danger line. Such a loss is not covered by a marine policy, but would be covered by a war risk policy if backed by the Government. And if the question of neutrality arises——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have a right to the other five minutes to reply.

Mr. MOORE. I have not completed my statement. I appeal to the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. ADAMSON. I am very sorry for the gentleman. Everybody knows how demure and silent he is. I am very sorry he has been run over, but I should like to make some progress. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] will be recognized in reply to him.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from New York a member of the committee?

Mr. LEVY. No; but the Chair promised to recognized me.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], a member of the committee.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], in offering this amendment, discloses his real purpose to be not to help the bill, but, if possible, to kill it. He says he is opposed to the Government going into the insurance business, and yet here is a bill that limits the Government in the business proposed, made necessary because there is a great crisis facing the country, to meet the necessity of moving the products of the country to the markets of the world. The gentleman wants to amend the measure and put the Government into the insurance business generally, not for the purpose of helping the bill or of improving conditions, but for the purpose of killing it. He knows that such an amendment would make the bill unpopular; would arouse opposition to it, and thereby to some extent discredit the splendid purpose for which it has been proposed. Yet when this crisis confronts the country, when we are unable to move our products, the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to stand in the way of legislation that would enable the people to move our products. This is necessary for that purpose and for that purpose only. The bill contains a provision that enables the President of the United States, when that necessity has passed away, to suspend the measure and discontinue the employment of its provisions. Its enactment is beneficial to every public interest in our great country at this time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says he stands here for Americanism, and that he wants to help the American people, yet he insists upon so crippling and loading down this bill as to prevent the Government helping the American people in this hour of great emergency. That is the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That is how he wants to help the American people. That is how he wants their food and manufactured products to move. He wants, if possible, to throw an impediment in the way of this legislation so that this bill will go to the country crippled and unable to meet the emergency required of it at this time. This bill is introduced for the purpose of enabling the American people to have their corn, their beef, their cattle, their cotton, and their manufactured products transported to other markets of the world, to bring back in payment therefor the gold of other countries to this country and increase our wealth.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that we have a surplus of these products, and that we now have a chance to capture the commerce of the world and hold it; yet so un-American is he that he wants to stand in the way of legislation that will enable us to increase our markets and expand our commerce. That is the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I hope that his amendment will be voted down and that this measure will be put upon its passage, so that it may go to the White House without delay to be signed by the President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen on that side of the House have suddenly shifted their position, but it seems it is easy for them to do that. Only a few weeks ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] were eloquently deploring the fact that the Democratic Party by its tariff legislation had injured the manufacturer and the farmer by depriving them of their markets abroad, and had created a condition which had brought about low prices for their products and that they were unable for that reason to compete with the rest of the world. That charge was not true then, because prices of all products at that time were exceptionally high with a good demand for everything we produce. But behold their attitude to-day. What a change has come over the spirit of their dreams. Now they say it is true we have a surplus of almost everything, but we must keep it, we must not export it; we must not supply with our surplus other markets and furnish food for hungry mouths abroad, because forsooth we will increase the price of these products at home. What has so recently convinced them that the farmer and the manufacturer must keep their surplus, let their farms and factories stand idle, men out of employment, until we at home consume our surplus? Strange doctrine this for these two gentlemen to be now proclaiming when, less than two months ago, they were denouncing the Democratic Party for stifling industry, retarding development, and surrendering foreign markets. Their position was false then and is ridiculously so now. Would either of these gentlemen dare tell the manufacturers, the farmers, the laborers of this country that we know there is a great surplus of farm products; the manufacturers, that we know you produce much more than we can consume yearly, but the surplus we should not export but should keep it all at home for our consumption, and the farms and mills should stand idle until we consume it all, and labor remain unemployed? Do they believe they could win votes by espousing such a doctrine?

It would be the adoption of a new doctrine on their part, and one they would soon repudiate. They are both playing politics to-day. It is distressing to them to see this great Democratic administration, capable and courageous as it is, rising up and meeting the great emergency that has been suddenly and without any fault on its part thrust upon the country. They regret that it is both able and willing to handle these great questions and solve the intricate problems presented, to the complete satisfaction of the American people. We all know this fact to be true. Whether or not it is winning the approval of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and from Iowa, it is winning the earnest commendation of the American people for its prompt and satisfactory action on these most important matters. It will unfetter our prostrate commerce and start argosies on the seas laden with the surplus of our production, which will stimulate industry and supply the wants of people in distressed lands. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will touch the springs of industry all over our fair country, which will respond with increased production sufficient to meet the requirements and stimulate the commerce of the greatest people known throughout the annals of time, and will inaugurate the most marvelous era of prosperity ever known. Yes; the Democratic Party is able, capable, and sufficiently courageous to meet the responsibility and discharge its duty in the interest of all the people and for advantage to the entire country. [Applause.]

But gentlemen on that side declare the adoption of this measure, they fear, may precipitate war with some foreign country now in a state of belligerency, and for that reason we should not enact it.

Ah, gentlemen who assert this objection less than two months ago were vigorous in their censure of President Wilson and his able Secretary of State because they would not plunge this country in war with unfortunate Mexico. But they pursued the policy the American people approved, avoided war with Mexico, and they will, wise and able as they are, avoid war in this instance and preserve the honor of this great Nation, which they so ably represent.

Gentlemen need not waste their time and labor in criticizing these two great men, because the people of this country confide in them as they never confided before in any President and Secretary of State, however illustrious any of their predecessors may have been. They have earned the confidence and gratitude of the people of this country, and they will show it by their overwhelming indorsement on every opportunity.

The people of this country have come to know Woodrow Wilson and appreciate his unselfish purpose, his great patriotism, and his wise constructive statesmanship. They know he is able to cope with every emergency and has the courage to meet and deal with the questions as they arise and solve them in the best interests of the people and for the promotion of the welfare of the great country over which he presides. The people of this country, irrespective of party, know the great and diversified interests of this country are safe in his hands and that he will work out the destiny of the Republic while he is its Chief Executive for the best interests of its people; that he has dedicated himself to the great work for which he has been called, ripe in scholarship, wise in statesmanship, conscientious in the performance of duty, inspired by high ideals and lofty patriotism, fully equipped to promote the prosperity, preserve the honor, and elevate the standard of this the greatest Republic of all time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the bureau of war-risk insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have power to make any and all rules and regulations necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This bill confers upon the bureau which we are about to create tremendous powers. I want to call the attention of the House to the extent of those tremendous powers. The power granted this bureau is illustrated in a colloquy between the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in the discussion on yesterday:

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to know if it is intended by the Government to insure vessels that go into danger zones? For instance, are we going to insure one of our vessels that goes into the North Sea after notice has been served upon us that it is dangerous? If so, I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman's question is a matter of discretion with the insurance company, which in this case would be this board. They would have the power.

Yes; the Government would have the power to assume dangerous and hazardous risks which insurance companies do not want to assume.

What are the reasons assigned for this law by those who are sponsors for it? The gentleman from Alabama says this law is necessary for three reasons. He says it is necessary, first, in order to find a market for our corn; second, to find a market for our wheat; and, third, to find a market for our cotton. In 1913 we had for sale the largest corn crop we had grown in more than a decade; yet during that year we exported less than 47,000,000 bushels of corn. For the year 1914 we will export to all countries less than 8,000,000. And yet, according to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], it is necessary to involve the Government in this great risk, to impose upon the Government this great responsibility in order to send a few bushels of corn abroad.

The gentleman from Alabama made some very excellent speeches on the floor of this House, usually more in detail than his speech in support of this bill. His support of this bill is urged in behalf of the entire American people. Usually the gentleman assigns as a reason for his support of a measure that it will aid the consumer or the producer. Is this bill offered as a measure of relief to the American consumer from the high cost of living, who to-day must pay $1.25 a bushel for his wheat? Would the gentleman from Alabama deplete our granaries and send our wheat abroad, making the cost of living higher in this country? In behalf of a constituency who are the largest corn raisers in this country I want to protest that they do not wish the Government to assume this great risk in order to send a little corn abroad. They do not want the Government to assume this great risk in order to send a little wheat abroad. If the gentlemen from the South want the Government to assume this great risk that may involve the United States in war, in order to market their cotton crop, they ought to be men enough and fair enough to say so, and not malign and misrepresent the farmers of the West and North in regard to their wheat crop and their corn crop by claiming this legislation is enacted in their interest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate be now closed on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has one minute remaining.

Mr. GOOD. Wheat is selling in Chicago at $1.25 a bushel, or thereabouts. Corn is selling for 80 cents a bushel. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] claim this market is not good enough? Does he claim this price is too low? If so, what becomes of his promise to the consumers to reduce the cost of living? When did it occur to the gentleman from Alabama that living at reasonable prices for the ordinary laboring man in America should be surrendered in order that the shipping trust may pay increased dividends? Ah, if we want to expand our foreign trade, let us do what this Congress has already indicated should be done. Let us expand our trade southward, where we will not send cargoes across seas and bays that are mined.

We appropriated $150,000 more than any previous Congress appropriated to build up our trade in South America. There is a great trade in South American countries for American manufactured products, and it is that trade that we now ought to seize, and our cargoes can go there without this insurance. Our cargoes can go there and build up an American trade that in time of peace would be a monument to the statesmanship of the party that would secure that trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I remember that about 10 years ago a protest went up from every quarter of this country against the unlawful practices of the insurance companies of this country. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] has said that for every $3 of premium they collected for marine insurance their risks only amounted to $1, and now without any demand from the consuming public, without any demand from the producing public, with only a demand from the insurance companies themselves, this great Democratic Party puts forward this issue that Congress should now help out these insurance companies; that when the risk comes, when the real responsibility comes, it must be assumed by the Government and an appropriation made of $5,000,000 out of the Treasury to underwrite these very risks. [Applause on the Republican side.] If we would subsidize the Shipping Trust, let us do it in the open. If we would guarantee increased profits to marine insurance companies, let us manfully say so; but let us not do these questionable things under the guise of aiding the western farmer.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish an advisory board, to consist of three members skilled in the practices of war-risk insurance, for the purpose of assisting the bureau of war risk insurance in fixing rates of premium and in adjustment of claims for losses, and generally in carrying out the purposes of this act; the compensation of the members of said board to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. In the event of disagreement as to the claim for losses, or amount thereof, between the said bureau and the parties to such contract of insurance, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States in the district court of the United States, sitting in admiralty, in the district in which the claimant or his agent may reside.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I regret exceedingly that the Members of this House are not in accord with this bill. I think they are all wrong on one side. I consider this one of the most important bills before this House. We have been tied up in exchange and in shipping risks. I investigated the question in New York and ascertained that the fault to a great extent was the failure to have war risks. All nations have war-risk insurance. Why should we not have them? We run into no liability, as gentlemen here have contended. I much prefer to have a director on this board with a large salary, so important is the question. There is no danger in any way, because we are not going to insure contraband goods. The international law is not to be construed in the way that gentlemen here have construed it. The London declaration is not in force, but the international law will be sustained throughout the world. There is no question about that.

We will have first-class officials to administer this law who will attend to the insurance. They are not going to insure contraband goods nor vessels belonging to other nations.

In relation to the chamber of commerce, it was only last week—I think on Tuesday—that I made it my business to see the president of the chamber of commerce, and he said that they were all in favor of the bill, that it was the most important bill now before the House, and that it would help out exchange and shipping.

We have a good many ships at the present time in the port of New York tied up because they can not obtain war risks. That is the main trouble. When we secure the war risk, exchange will let up. I think, gentlemen, you are making a great mistake in delaying this bill. The bill ought to have been passed last week. There may be a few minor corrections that would improve the bill, but I am for the bill as it is. I would not delay it a day. I would pass it now. If you put any amendments on, it will have to go back to the Senate and will take another week, and in that way delay the financial and commercial business of the United States. As I said before, it is a great mistake not to pass it immediately. I think we all ought to stand by the bill and pass it unanimously—Republicans and Democrats. We are all patriots. [Applause.] I know you all mean to do right, but you are drifting away under a mistaken idea. The bill is a good bill. I do not believe the United States will get into any difficulties on account of it, as some gentlemen contend. I think we all ought to stand together and pass it and make it a law this week. [Applause.]

Through the courtesy of the New York Herald I have just received a wire stating that there are in the New York Harbor at the present time 202 passenger and freight vessels, 13 barks, and 3 full-rigged ships; that 75 per cent of these are detained there on account of the war. Last week there were 207 vessels in port—the largest number in the history of New York port.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes.

Mr. MANAHAN. I may want to oppose the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will make it 10 minutes, so that the gentleman from Minnesota can use 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANAHAN. I think we shall want 15. I want some time.

Mr. ADAMSON. You are the gentleman from Minnesota I referred to.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I want 5 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, after the word "Treasury," in line 15, insert the following: "but not to exceed $25 a day each while actually employed."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish an advisory board, to consist of three members skilled in the practices of war-risk insurance, for the purpose of assisting the bureau of war-risk insurance. It further authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the compensation of such officials. It seems to me that the House should fix some limitation upon the amount that can be paid to those experts. I have suggested that the sum of $25 a day when actually employed would be reasonable compensation for such persons. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to direct my remarks entirely to this amendment, although I think it is in its purpose wise and timely. Nor would I speak upon the bill at all had it not been for the fact that an entirely unfair angle has been given to this discussion. This great measure ought not to have been brought down to the low level of partisan politics. The leader of the majority discredited himself and embarrassed his supporters by attempting to charge that the minority of the House was un-American in case it saw fit to oppose this bill. I do not believe any man in this country is justified to-day in charging his fellow man, especially a Member of this House, with being un-American or traitorous because, forsooth, he opposes this bill; and I, for one, resent the wholesale charge of the leader of the majority, personally and as a Member of the Republican Party. I do not think there has been a word said that justified it, nor an action taken which in any way invited it. In fact, I believe the accusation was made for the sole purpose of partisan advantage and not for the purpose of clarifying the situation regarding this measure. Therefore I say—and say with reluctance and regret—that the distinguished leader who made the charge discredited himself in making it and unnecessarily embarrassed his followers in the House.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am in favor of this bill, not on the ground suggested by some of those who advocate it, that it will enable us to send vast quantities of our crops abroad and bring back gold; not as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] argued, that it will enable us now under the stress of other nations to reach out and gobble up the markets of the world, because I say deliberately that the awful insanity of Europe, the terrible tragedy of humanity now being enacted in foreign lands, is due to that very spirit of greed and lust for wealth and power, and to no other cause.

And I say this great Nation would make a mistake, and it would be recreant to its traditions, and would be untrue to its aspirations, if now, because foreign nations are embarrassed and in a desperate struggle with each other, we pass legislation imbued with no other purpose or motive than to gobble up their property or commerce or opportunities. That is a base, ignoble motive. I do not believe this House or this Nation will be actuated by it. It is unwise, as well as base and ignoble, as demonstrated by the insanity of Europe at this present hour, because those great nations are destroying each other and the innocent lives of millions solely as a result of the greed and covetousness and lust for power that has taken possession of the public mind and of the great leaders of those nations—such greed and covetousness as seems to actuate some of the supporters of this bill. I am in favor of this bill for purely economic reasons. I do not believe it will invite disaster nor invite trouble with foreign nations. If I did, I would be the last man to vote for it. No gentleman who has spoken has given, to my mind, a good and valid reason why this bill, if enacted into law, will invite us to trouble or occasion us trouble with the nations of Europe. The danger urged is purely a figment of the imagination. But there is a grave economic reason for this bill, in that it will tend to upbuild what is so badly needed by the American people, namely, a merchant marine. It is one of the incidents of the business of a merchant marine to have insurance, and to have insurance at a reasonable rate, and therefore I welcome this opportunity to vote for a measure that will place under the guidance and control of the Government the business of marine insurance, even though it is only war-risk insurance. It is a step in the right direction, which, if followed up, will in days to come enable us to build up and maintain as an auxiliary and support of a protecting Navy a great merchant marine that will operate along honorable lines, under the control, if not the ownership, of the Government, and along those correct principles of trade and commerce which will bring prosperity, peace, and security to this country, and that is the best that we can hope for and all that we desire. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] illustrates the method of the construction of this bill. It was badly drafted, as his amendment discloses, and as I will further demonstrate. The proper phrasing of such a measure has not received the consideration that it should have received, either in the Senate or in the House, and neither committee attempted any serious criticism of its terms, and the amendments actually adopted were "hand-me-downs." The members of the House committee well know that no charge can be laid against me for delaying the recommendation by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this legislation, because it was within my power by merely requesting the presence of a quorum at the time to delay the final consideration of the measure by the committee. I did not do so, as it was urged that haste was necessary, although I then warned the committee that the bill had not been adequately considered, that adequate information had not been given to it by the committee, and that its construction was faulty and serious trouble might ensue if it be placed on the statute book in its present form. But you gentlemen have assumed this responsibility, and we can do no more.

In addition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which ought to be adopted, because there ought to be some limitation for the expense of this board, I suggest, in all sincerity, another defect which ought to have been considered. I desire to call the attention of those who are favoring this bill to the condition of section 2. I sought an opportunity to properly amend that section where I considered it defective, but the committee adopted a motion shutting off amendment and shutting off discussion of that section upon a matter that should have been considered. Those in charge of this measure have been very forward in severely criticizing, and especially us who have had the termity to differ with them as to this measure, its defects, and its expected results; and you have been impatient at any suggestions from us for any improvement. I do not expect any change now, but it may afford you some consolation, indeed it does us, that the careless drafting of section 2 has left a condition which may be disagreeable, to speak mildly, which we would have gladly pointed out and corrected if you had given us the time instead of gagging and binding us by limiting the time and opportunity for amendment and debate.

I desire to call attention to section 2, especially as to the use of the word "American," in lines 11, 14, and 15. In line 11 the bill reads:

Insurance by the United States of American vessels.

That use in such a connection evidently makes a distinction in the meaning between the words "United States" and the word "American." Used in that juxtaposition it seems to me that it might be, and, indeed, should be, fairly construed that there is a difference of meaning between these two terms and that as so used they are not to be regarded as synonymous. It seems to me that the term "American" should be stricken out and "vessels of the United States and its citizens" inserted. In that way the terms would be of the same meaning, if so intended. Now the reason for that is this: Lines 14 and 15 provide—

That American vessels, shippers, importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

In this connection, what is the meaning of the word "American"? What legislative definition or judicial definition has been given to the word "American"? It may mean South American, Central American, as well as North American, or be confined to the United States alone, and in its use above in this section it does not seem to be synonymous with the United States. If not, what would be the consequences? For example, we all know that there have been quite a number of ships registered in Costa Rica, in Central America, doing business with the United States and belonging, I think, in large part to United States citizens. Suppose any one of these Costa Rican vessels should not be desired to be transferred to the register of the United States and yet should be engaged in some trade where it may become necessary to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

I think the very concerns who own these vessels are possibly endeavoring to do some business across the Atlantic with such or other lines which they control. Suppose they were under the Costa Rican flag, claiming to be American vessels—that is, Central American—and should come before this bureau of war insurance and state that the American importers and American shippers could not get adequate protection for their vessels and cargoes and they wanted the privileges of this bill as Americans. The question would be raised at once by the board that there is a difference between the meaning of "United States" and of the word "American"; and the context shows such difference in meaning does exist. Those gentlemen would have the right to contend, under the language of that section, that they have the right to participate in that war insurance and to take advantage of your bounty. There would be no particular peril if they were refused, but it would be a promise to the ear and a violation of such promise and statute in the refusal. Of course it would not be granted, but it shows the looseness with which this bill has been drafted, and it shows that evils of that sort might breed prejudices injurious to our commerce, people, and interests. Just such little errors as that might create a sentiment against us among some of our American neighbors which would seriously injure our expected increase of trade among the Americas. We have no monopoly of the word "America." The others have the equal right to its use, and when it is so used it should mean what it states. When used as it here seems to be used, in contradistinction to the term "United States," we seem to clearly indicate such distinction. If we do, then by this section and bill we hold ourselves out as this Government writing war-risk insurance for all the Americas. I do not believe it was so intended. It should be so amended as to prevent such difficulty and possible misconstruction. The amendment of the gentleman from New York shows such a looseness. I do not expect the gentleman will adopt the suggestion which I have offered, but I do wish to show the committee that this bill has not been carefully drafted and it is filled with loopholes of just this character, which are liable at any time to cause misapprehension and possible trouble. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 75, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the director of the bureau of war-risk insurance, upon the adjustment of any claims for losses in respect of which no action shall have been begun, shall, on approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, promptly pay such claim for losses to the party in interest; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to make provision for the speedy adjustment of claims for losses and also for the prompt notification of parties in interest of the decisions of the bureau on their claims.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, as one of those Republicans who have been supporting the Democratic emergency measures offered by the gentlemen on the other side, it is a matter of very great regret to me that the leader of the opposition has chosen this particular time to inject partisanship into this question. I am loath to believe that the leader of the majority is a different man two months before the election from what he is during all of the preceding months. I have the highest regard for him, as I believe all the Members on this side have, but during the last few days we have noticed a disposition on his part to make campaign material out of the questions that come up here in this House.

We were first treated by him to a resolution penalizing us if we should go home to campaign, which on its face, and taking into consideration the circumstances connected therewith, is a partisan resolution and is unfair to those Members on this side who have not yet been nominated or who yet have a campaign to make for election. Then we are treated by him to a declaration, made in the House of Representatives yesterday and to-day, that any man who does not now back this bill, and presumably anything that may be proposed nowadays by that side, is acting in an un-American manner. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the definition of un-American is as used on that side. Some of us Republicans have been supporting these measures suggested by the President in the European war crisis because we wanted to support him at such times, but if gentlemen on that side of the aisle are going to loudly proclaim that anybody who opposes anything that is offered on that side, whether an emergency measure or not, is not a patriotic American, then it is time for us to denounce that attitude. Mr. UNDERWOOD, the Democratic leader, said yesterday:

But I have not reached the point where I am unwilling to protect the lives of American citizens and the American flag and American commerce in their rights on the high seas or at home.

He quotes almost the language of the Democratic platform, and yet, Mr. Chairman, down there in Mexico, when they had a chance recently to protect American citizens and American property on land and not on the high seas, they failed to do so, and they violated the platform which now the leader of the majority says should be sacredly observed.

Mr. Chairman, we had a condition there different in one way from what we will have if we send these ships out bearing contraband goods. Those Americans who went down to Mexico went there in good faith long before the war arose there and took all that they had with them, and yet when the news reached Tampico that the Americans had seized Vera Cruz the three American gunboats that were out there in the Tampico Harbor, ostensibly to protect American lives, quietly lifted their anchors and went away and left those American citizens, women and children, whom you promised to protect, absolutely without protection from the fury of the mob formed to attack them, because the State Department said that it might make the Mexicans mad if you protected the Americans there. They had to rely on the charity of German naval officers to protect and take them away. That is the kind of protection that we have had. And, Mr. Chairman, while I am opposed to war, I do not believe that the fear of war should keep us from protecting American citizens in time of great extremity, or should cause us to be branded as the only Nation in Christendom that will not protect its citizens. I am in favor of the Democratic platform in regard to that matter, but not in favor of Democratic performance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill that is offered here—I say it at the risk of being called "un-American"—proposes to send out upon the high seas ships bearing contraband goods. That is the intent of it. Otherwise the gentlemen on the other side would have voted for the amendment which expressly disclaimed that intent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if they are going to deliberately send those ships out on the high seas bearing contraband goods in the face of a great European war, I want to ask them if they are going to protect them as they protected American citizens in Mexico, or will they give them real protection? For myself, I believe the Government insurance of those ships puts the matter in an entirely different light than it would be if American citizens, willing to take the risks, would send out private vessels, because you are putting the Government back of that enterprise by this bill, and if some foreign power captures some vessel that this great Government has insured, then it may embroil us in that war, unless, Mr. Chairman, we are going to lay down the rule in this country that, no matter what is done to an American citizen or no matter what is done to an American ship or no matter what is done to American property, we are willing to lie down and say "amen" to it.

I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Chairman, because it is not really an emergency bill and because I believe it may put us in the position of either having to fight in order to protect some ship which a belligerent may believe is carrying contraband goods, or else put us in the position of making another miserable surrender when some foreign power inflicts hardships upon American citizens or takes American property. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto may be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of paying losses accruing under the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

If some of the gentleman on that side in their effort to play partisan politics could have their way, they would prevent the passage of this measure that seeks to provide for the carrying of the grain that the western farmer produces to the hungry women and children of Europe. They would deprive the farmers of the West of a market that this very legislation seeks to give to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But gentlemen in their effort to play politics are standing here and obstructing as best they can the passage of a bill that the President of the United States deems wise and necessary at this time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is emergency legislation made necessary by conditions created by the war in Europe, and gentlemen in order to play partisan politics will throw themselves at a time like this in front of a measure that must be passed. Let me say to you gentlemen, it is not long until the November election, and your elections will soon be on and nearly every one of you who are now fighting this legislation and other measures indorsed by the administration will be apologizing to your constituents for opposing President Wilson. You will have a lot of explaining to do to your own constituents. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I will yield briefly.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman from Alabama think that this foreign war has helped his party out a great deal to conceal its blunders?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the fear exists on that side that it will lift still higher in the estimation of the American people this peace-loving President, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You are driven to sheer desperation because of that fear, and so anxious are you to play for partisan advantage that you allow yourselves to be used in opposing measures like this. You are so disturbed and scared that you have lost your heads, and there are but few of you left on that side, and when we get through with you in November there will be still fewer of you old "standpatters" there than there are now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Quit this filibustering, gentlemen. When you get ready to make a point of no quorum you slip out into the cloakrooms and in the halls, so that the Speaker of this House can not count you, and then you refer to my absence for only two days, and one of the days was caused by a railroad wreck. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, when I advocated the passage of the resolution to keep Members here I knew I had an engagement to go to Kentucky to lay the corner stone of a public building, and I was willing to forfeit the money coming to me for the time that it required.

But you can not excuse your filibustering methods and your partisan politics in a time like this on my failure to be here for two days. Quit your filibustering tactics and your play for partisan advantage. We are fighting for measures that must be passed if we would keep the markets open to our products—measures that mean much to our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I was going to move to close debate now, but seeing my eloquent friend from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE] rise—my friend who has so hard a time to get a hearing in this House—I have changed my mind and will now move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 6, strike out the paragraph and insert the following: "SEC. 7. That upon the deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of an indemnity fund in cash or Government bonds equal in amount to any appropriation herein made, there is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to explain this amendment I desire to thank my distinguished and eloquent friend from Georgia, Mr. ADAMSON, for having lifted the embargo upon debate, for having called in the gag rule, that we might have five minutes' free discussion on this momentous question. The exigencies of the argument and the opposition encountered in the conduct of this bill through the Committee of the Whole have been such that, contrary to his usual practice, the gentleman from Georgia has repeatedly moved to shut off debate. He has done this whenever opportunity offered, although I am sure he has done it reluctantly.

I have offered this amendment, because it seems to me that you gentlemen who now have the responsibility of legislation have no right to take $5,000,000 of the money of "the poor people of this land," for whom you have so often pleaded, and risk it for the benefit of the special interests who have their ships on the high seas. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] It seems to me that you could afford to be generous with "the poor farmers of the land, who pay the taxes," and on whom, you have so often contended, the real burdens of the Government rest. It seems to me you should also have some consideration for the working people in the mills and the factories, for you have often "bled and died" most eloquently upon this floor in their behalf. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. The income tax collected from the sections of the country, including Pennsylvania and New York, amounts to 33 per cent of the whole.

Mr. MOORE. Well, if they have made only 33 per cent it seems to me that you Democrats who gag at earnings and percentages might divide it with the poor people whom you claim to represent in this House. You are the "truly" friends of the poor.

My amendment, Mr. Chairman, provides that an indemnity fund shall be raised to make good to the people of the United States, to the taxpayers of the United States, whom you profess to defend, the $5,000,000 which you are taking away from them to stake on this new and dangerous enterprise. It seems to me that an accurate reading of the names of these very distinguished men who came, many of them, directly from Wall Street, the very center of the awful Money Trust, which was an anathema in this House only a few months ago, to induce you to put up $5,000,000 of the people's money in this war-insurance scheme, might convince you that possibly they could do this work themselves. I am not fully convinced that the check of any one of them would not be sufficient to establish a company with a capital sufficient to do all this business as a private enterprise, and thus save the Government the money risk and the people the frightful war uncertainty which is now staring them in the face. It seems to me, I say, that an accurate reading of their names—the names of these gentlemen from New York who brought you this legislation—would be very instructive and edifying just at this moment. Let me read the names of some of these distinguished gentlemen; there were 60 or more of them in all, we are told, who in conference with the forceful Democratic leaders of this body at the White House induced them to bring in this bill.

Let us see exactly who these gentlemen were. Mr. Samuel Rea was one of them, a gentleman for whom I have a very high regard. He is a good Democrat and also the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. He was one of these men who signed the report of the committee. Another was Mr. Alfred H. Smith, the president, I believe, of the New York Central Railroad. He was one of those who asked you to vote this $5,000,000 of the people's money to save the risks which shippers might undergo if they sent their ships to dangerous places in foreign countries and took the chances that the ordinary marine insurance companies would not take. Mr. Jacob H. Schiff was another one of these gentlemen who signed this report and made this request of the President and the Democratic leaders. He is a distinguished member of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and, according to speeches which have become familiar on the other side of the House, is one of the men who manipulate the wealth of this country. Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan was another, and I am sure it is not necessary to explain who he is. The Democratic Party has investigated him thoroughly and denounced him fully. Incidentally I commend to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] the class of men for whom in defense of this bill he speaks to-day, because he so often speaks for that other class of "downtrodden agriculturists" in the rural districts of the State of Indiana. [Laughter.] Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, the president of the National City Bank, of New York, was another of the petitioners for this governmental insurance fund of $5,000,000. Is it the Standard Oil Co. or the United States Steel Corporation that wields a powerful influence at this great banking institution? Perhaps in consequence of their new associations some of our Democratic brethren can tell. And Mr. James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, is another of the signers of the petition upon the strength of which you propose to vote $5,000,000 of the people's money out of the Treasury to safeguard private and special interests against losses that may occur in the oil business, or the steel business, or the cotton business, or other shipments from the United States into Russia, Germany, and other countries that are now at war. This risk you propose to incur, despite your home market, merely for the sake of foreign gold. And these are the gentlemen for whom you are asking the people of the country to pass this bill, these 60 or more, mostly from Wall Street, which you so bitterly condemned. Remarkable, indeed, is this new-found "emergency," which has induced the Democratic Party to change front as the real and only friend of "the downtrodden and the poor." As we now behold it, trampling upon its own pretenses, it stands forth as the representative of the "special interests," bracing itself to vote away the people's money to save the money of the rich. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the bureau of war-risk insurance, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in line 12, after the word "insurance," insert the following: "including the payment of salaries herein authorized and other personal services in the District of Columbia."

Mr. ADAMSON. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to make a statement for the RECORD, to show the reason for this amendment. There is a statute which prohibits the payment of any salaries out of lump appropriations unless the salary be specifically provided for. It also prohibits the payment of personal services in the District of Columbia out of such an appropriation unless specific authority is given in the appropriation. In order that this bureau may not be crippled at the outset, which it will be without such authority, this amendment is necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the gentleman from New York that I think his amendment is not complete. While I do not know that I am specially interested in putting the bill into proper shape, still under a recent ruling of the comptroller, to which the gentleman's attention has been recently directed, or will be directed shortly, by a message transmitted to the Speaker, there could not be any rent paid for any quarters in the District of Columbia out of this fund unless it is specifically authorized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true; but there are accommodations in the Treasury Department, I think, ample for any force that may be utilized in this way.

Mr. MANN. If they have any space in the Treasury Department, I am quite willing that they shall use it, considering the fact that they are renting a large amount of space in other parts of the city on the ground, as stated, that they have not room enough in the Treasury Department.

Mr. ADAMSON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I want to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am sure it is a great delight to the House to know that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has returned safely. The country took great chances when he ran into a wreck anywhere. Think what a loss it would be if the gentleman from Alabama was not permitted to be in the House every day! A few days ago he appeared in the House and notified the Members that the Republicans were absent, and that he proposed to see that they were present. Then he immediately took a train to leave town and ran into a railroad wreck. Just before he made that speech he had not been in the House for several weeks.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was away when there was nothing of importance to do in the House. We were waiting on the Senate. I went to attend our family reunion, and was there about 10 days.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's statement that he had been gone is true; but there was much going on in the House, notwithstanding his absence. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I know the gentleman from Alabama probably thinks that the House can not operate unless he is here. Yet when I recall the fact that the gentleman from Alabama during this session has been absent 59 times when there was a roll call in the House and a record vote, I have wondered whether the gentleman might not be mistaken in thinking that we could not perform unless he was here to tell us how. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit one more interruption?

Mr. MANN. I will yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The roll calls the gentleman speaks of were had, the most of them, when there was no necessity for a quorum. The House was simply marking time and the roll calls that were had were forced by the useless filibuster conducted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. That statement is not correct, and the gentleman knows it is not correct.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman had roll call after roll call after Mr. UNDERWOOD tried to get him to agree that we could adjourn for three days at the time. He would not agree to the suggestion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, and yet there was nothing to keep us here. We were waiting on the Senate.

Mr. MANN. There has been a roll call on no such proposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. We had roll calls on motions to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the last session of Congress. I have not included that in the time. The gentleman from Alabama was absent at the special session, but I have included only those absences of the gentleman—and sorry we were that he was away—when we were actually doing business at this session of Congress. The gentleman was absent on 59 roll calls.

Mr. HEFLIN. If that is true, they were roll calls growing out of a Republican filibuster on motions to adjourn and the like. They were not on questions of importance.

Mr. MANN. There have been no roll calls on motions to adjourn at this session of Congress. The gentleman should not run into a buzz saw.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman is mistaken. We have had roll calls on the motion to adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in lieu of section 9, insert the following:

"SEC. 9. The President is authorized, whenever in his judgment the necessity for further war insurance by the United States shall have ceased to exist, to suspend the operation of this act in so far as it authorizes insurance by the United States against loss or damage by risk of war, which suspension shall be made at any event within two years after the passage of this act, but shall not affect any insurance outstanding at the time or any claims pending adjustment. For the purpose of the final adjustment of any such outstanding insurance or claims, the bureau of war-risk insurance may, in the discretion of the President, be continued in existence for a further period not to exceed four months."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the committee was undoubtedly to put in the power of the President the authority to terminate the bureau of war-risk insurance when the necessity for it had ceased. But under the wording of the provision, if the President shall terminate the operation of the act whenever he finds that necessity for further war insurance does not exist, there is no provision made to take care of outstanding risks or outstanding claims.

Moreover, the provision suggested, that the bureau be continued for two years, with the further provision for an extension of four months, would insure that the final termination of the existence of the bureau would be at a period when Congress would be in session, so that if any necessity existed for its continuance there would be no difficulty arising from inability to extend because Congress were not in session.

I believe that the amendment, as suggested, merely makes more certain and definite what is to be done, and protects against any possibility the inability of the bureau to take care of outstanding risks and claims.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that four months is a reasonable time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is four months after two years. It provides that the President shall suspend the operation of the act within two years, but he may extend it four months additional.

Mr. MANN. Suppose he should suspend the operation of the act on March 15 next—and we hope that that may occur—and that they had a lot of war-risk insurance outstanding?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the amendment covers that.

Mr. MANN. I understood the amendment to say that the bureau could only be extended for four months after the President suspended the operation of the act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is four months after the suspension of the act. Suppose the suspension of the act occurred on the 4th of March, and there is no extra session. It might be essential, in order to wind up insurance already outstanding, that the bureau should continue in existence longer than four months.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the construction that I place upon the provision is different from that of the gentleman from Illinois; but if there be any difference of opinion as to how it shall be construed, it should be modified. I therefore ask unanimous consent to insert "one year" instead of "four months."

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that in lieu of the "four months" he might say "to the next session of Congress."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest one year. I believe it better to make the time definite, and such time would be ample.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out "four months" and inserting in lieu thereof "one year." Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object, for the purpose of pointing out that the settlement of war insurance claims are likely to extend far beyond the time suggested in the amendment. During the war between Japan and Russia there were a number of vessels on the Pacific Ocean——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires a few minutes' time, I shall ask that debate on this section end in five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman. I should like to make a short statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York has completed his amendment, I accept it, and I ask that all debate close at the end of five minutes, unless the gentleman from Washington concludes in less than that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the words "four months" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one year." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, as modified, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if we go into a governmental war-risk insurance business, as we seem determined to do, the commission in charge of the work will undoubtedly be engaged for many years longer than this bill, or even the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], contemplates; that is, provided, of course, that ships come under our flag and get into the over-seas business.

Mr. Chairman, the war between Russia and Japan lasted but a little over one year and involved only those two nations. Quite a large number of vessels on the Pacific Ocean undertook to do business on the seas in the Far East. Not all of these vessels undertook to go directly to either of the belligerent countries. Nearly all of them got into trouble. I have in mind the particular case of the Blue Funnel liner Calchas, which steamed from Tacoma laden with a general mixed cargo, including a little wheat and some cotton. This cotton had been declared contraband of war, I think, by Japan. The vessel was seized by Russia, detained at Vladivostok for several months, and was finally released. The costs incident on the delay were very heavy. The Russian Government paid demurrage, but, nevertheless, some of the cargo having been seized and retained, it took between seven or eight years for the American owners of that cargo to secure a settlement. Other cases required five or six years.

If this bill we are now considering is intended to do any good at all, it will do so by paving the way for some form of war insurance to vessels which it is expected are to be transferred to American registry and which will go out from our ports for the purpose of making money and carrying goods which may or may not be contraband, but part of which will be under suspicion. Some of these vessels will be very old ones. Some of them will have foreign captains and crews, whose sympathies will be with some one or more of the European nations and not with the United States. They are likely to seek to carry contraband. All must have insurance in some form or other, and the cost of that insurance should fall on those who expect to receive the goods, be they contraband or otherwise.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] should have been adopted. It would have permitted the United States to have drawn a clear line and would have led to the development of commerce with strictly neutral nations, would have permitted the insurance of such cargoes, and, if sustained long enough, would have played a part in actually developing and sustaining an American merchant marine.

Mr. Chairman, on August 3, when there was rushed through this body, with debate limited to 30 minutes, the bill providing for American registry, I, remembering some of the experiences of the Pacific coast importers, cautioned the gentlemen who were putting that bill through without amendment that the insurance problem would be the one to come up and bother them. I said then:

> While we are talking of picking up old foreign ships for use under the American flag we should consider the matter of insurance. If we pass such legislation that foreign vessels can come under American registry, I do not think that the insurance will drop to any such figure that the people of the United States will feel warranted in sending great cargoes into the ports of war-ravaged countries.

I am still of the opinion that war-risk rates will not drop even with this governmental insurance, and that this Nation will find itself underwriting the wrong risks, and that the danger and the doubt will continue. Corn and wheat and foodstuffs will be wanted by all the European nations, and will continue to be declared contraband by all. This bill is woefully incomplete.

Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that this House has seen fit to-day to refuse to add a direct and positive clause to this bill stating definitely where we stand on the question of contraband and neutrality. That would have given a perfected bill that every Member could have supported without fear of its creating entangling and long-drawn-out situations, with the hope that it might really help in the moving of the cotton crop, which is, of course, its real purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The quesion is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, page 4, add as a new section the following:

"SEC. 10. That a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act and of all receipts hereunder shall be submitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that that section be renumbered, that the figures "11" be substituted for the figures "10."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that in line 20 the figures "10" be stricken out and the figures "11" be inserted in lieu thereof. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the preamble and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill and preamble be adopted. [Applause.]

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, and had directed him to report the bill with a preamble and with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, that the preamble be adopted, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe the rule provided for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Yes. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that comes after the engrossment and third reading.

The SPEAKER. But a Senate bill is not engrossed.

Mr. MANN. Well, after the third reading.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to strike out the preamble when the proper time arrives.

The SPEAKER. The practice about a House bill is to put the preamble after the engrossment and before the third reading and by analogy——

Mr. MANN. That is correct, and the motion would be in order now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to make a motion?

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest, inasmuch as the recommendation is that the preamble be stricken out, that a negative vote on that would serve the same purpose as the motion proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. That undoubtedly would be true.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the motion to strike out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Well, it is as broad as it is long. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the preamble.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The question was taken, and the preamble was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays. [Cries of "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 230, nays 58, answered "present" 6, not voting 137, as follows:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know if the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. RAGSDALE, is recorded as having voted?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MADDEN. I voted "nay"; but I am paired with the gentleman and wish to withdraw my vote of "nay" and vote "present."

The name of Mr. MADDEN was called, and he voted "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7967. An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system; and

H. R. 1657. An act providing for second homestead and desert-land entries.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FARR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read a dispatch I have just received from the New York Herald.

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. LEVY. I ask unanimous consent, then, to make it a part of my remarks. Will the gentleman from Illinois withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. MANN. No; I will not. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and that is the end of it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. LEVY. I have that leave anyhow. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman did not have to make his request.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, August 31, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. LEVER, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18492) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish uniform standards of classification for cotton; to provide for the application, enforcement, and use of such standards in transactions in interstate and foreign commerce; to prevent deception therein; and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1120), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I submit a proposal for a unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Shafroth
Bryan	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard
Burton	Hitchcock	Myers	Simmons
Chamberlain	Hollis	Nelson	Smoot
Chilton	Hughes	O'Gorman	Sterling
Clapp	Jones	Overman	Swanson
Culberson	Kern	Perkins	Thomas
Cummins	McCumber	Pomerene	Thornton
Dillingham	McLean	Reed	White

Mr. DILLINGHAM. My colleague [Mr. PAGE] is still detained in Vermont on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. OLIVER, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. VARDAMAN, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. NORRIS, Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, and Mr. RANSDELL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate heretofore given, and request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. COLT, Mr. GORE, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. LANE, and Mr. PITTMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on Monday, August 31, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said day, August 31, 1914, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. REED. I suggest to the author of the unanimous-consent agreement that he make it 4 o'clock instead of 2.

Mr. CULBERSON. The change may be made, Mr. President. I accept it with pleasure.

Mr. REED. I make the further suggestion that the limitation which provides that no one shall speak more than once be amended so that the author of an amendment may be permitted to speak twice, but not to consume in the aggregate more than 20 minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to have the first part of the agreement as to the time of voting again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate the part of the agreement to which the Senator from Iowa refers.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on Monday, August 31, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. My inquiry is this: After 4 o'clock can we discuss amendments offered to the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary did not state the entire proposed agreement.

Mr. CULBERSON. Under the proposed agreement after 4 o'clock amendments can be discussed for 20 minutes. I ask that the Secretary read the entire agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. Monday, August 31, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 4 o'clock on said day, August 31, 1914, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto, except the author of an amendment may be permitted to speak twice, but not to consume in the aggregate more than 20 minutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think I understand what is intended, but it seems to me there is a little conflict in the agreement. If we proceed to vote at 4 o'clock, it is hard for me to comprehend how we can debate after 4 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is in the regular form of unanimous-consent agreements which have been entered into since the present occupant of the chair has been presiding.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that debate to the extent of 15 minutes for each Senator on each amendment is allowed after 4 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is allowed after 4 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I have no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. The author of an amendment is allowed 20 minutes?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, does this agreement apply to the calendar day or to the legislative day of to-day?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is no time fixed at all, as I understand the agreement.

Mr. JONES. It ought to be ascertained whether the calendar day or the legislative day is referred to. I think it ought to be the legislative day of to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are now in the legislative day of August 25; we are not in a calendar day.

Mr. REED. I think it should be the legislative day for this reason: I am willing for this agreement to be made and am willing to get this debate down to fair limits, but when we get to that limited point, debate is bound to end in a reasonable time, and we ought not to be compelled to sit here until 12 o'clock at night.

Mr. JONES. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. SMOOT. It should be the legislative day, but it reads "on said day, August 31."

Mr. JONES. The proposed unanimous consent says "on said day, August 31," and therefore the bill must be disposed of on the calendar day of August 31.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the calendar day, as the agreement now stands.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am perfectly willing to have it legislative day or to make any agreement that may be satisfactory to the Senate in order that there may be a final conclusion of the matter within a reasonable time.

Mr. JONES. If it is understood that the debate need not be closed on the calendar day of to-day, I have no objection at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed agreement does not so provide, and the Chair is not going to make that statement. The agreement reads "calendar day."

Mr. CULBERSON. I am willing to insert the word "legislative," Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the word "legislative" be inserted.

Mr. JONES. Let it read "the present legislative day."

Mr. CULBERSON. We take a recess each day at 6 o'clock. We are acting in a legislative day now.

Mr. SMOOT. May I suggest to the Senator that we are now in the legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, and we can continue that legislative day as long as may be necessary.

Mr. CULBERSON. As I have said, I am willing to modify the proposed agreement in any reasonable way to get a vote and to get this matter before the Senate for final conclusion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement as it is proposed to be modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on the legislative day of August 25, 1914, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto, except the author of an amendment, who may speak twice, but not to consume in the aggregate more than 20 minutes.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, would not that provide for a vote at 4 o'clock on the 25th day of August?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed agreement will be restated. The Chair thinks that, with a slight modification, the proposed agreement as the Secretary is about to read it will cover the matter.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on Monday, August 31, 1914 (legislative day of August 25, 1914), the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto, except that a Senator proposing an amendment may speak twice, but not to consume in the aggregate more than 20 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], upon which the yeas and nays were ordered, and on being taken on Saturday last disclosed the lack of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri be restated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the first paragraph of section 8, on page 8, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce in the same line or lines of business.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in my judgment the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is not only a most pertinent but a very essential one if this bill is to accomplish the purposes for which it has been framed. This amendment is designed to take the place of the first paragraph of section 8, whose phraseology it substantially follows down to the point where the restriction is qualified.

In the section as reported by the committee a corporation engaged in commerce is prohibited from acquiring "the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation" only "where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

Mr. President, I would be better satisfied with the proposed amendment if it absolutely prohibited one corporation from holding shares or stock in any other corporation. At common law no such power existed. At common law and under the statutes of most of the States down to a quarter of a century ago the restrictions which experience had demonstrated to be necessary to safeguard the people against the growing power and expansion of corporate life were those the observance of which made it impossible for a corporation to invade the province of individual opportunity or individual right.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that had been the law 20 years ago, it would have been disastrous to the southern country. Let me give the Senator an example.

North Carolina, my State, has gotten to be a great cotton-manufacturing State, as the Senator knows. Our people in little communities have subscribed stock to build cotton mills. They have been able to put up the building and get stock for the capital, but they have not been able to buy the machinery. They have gone to Massachusetts, and the Massachusetts machinery people have furnished them machinery, and have taken payment in stock. They have gone to Pittsburgh, Pa., and have secured their boilers and engines. They did not have the money to pay for them, but the Pittsburgh people would sell them their machinery and take payment in stock. In Massachusetts the Whiting Machine Co. would sell them their machinery and take payment in stock.

By that means we have been able to build the cotton mills in my State, and by that means only, because the people did not have the money to buy the machinery, and these people in the North have been kind enough to let them have the machinery and pay for it in stock. If the law had been as the Senator urges that it should be, we could not have built a cotton mill in the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if it is not also a fact that many of our New England manufactories have taken stock directly in the cotton mills of the South?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no question about that. It has enabled us to build these mills.

Mr. GALLINGER. This would upset the entire business of cotton manufacturing, it seems to me.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, it would have been absolutely ruinous. Our people could not have built half a dozen mills in the State if they could not have acquired the machinery by means of the manufacturers taking stock in the corporations. They are not engaged in the same line of business. They are not in competition.

Why should not a Massachusetts corporation take stock in a southern cotton mill in payment for furnishing it the machinery? Why should not a Pittsburgh concern let us have a boiler and engine to run one of our mills and take stock in it? I do not see any objection to that. They are not competitive. What is the reason for not allowing them to take stock in the corporation?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, they would not be touched by my amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; not by the Senator's amendment; but I am answering what the Senator from Colorado says—that no corporation ought to be allowed to have stock in any other corporation. The policy of the country has changed. All the States in the Union, probably, have changed from the old common-law idea. There would have been distressing times with us if we could not have had this policy then. Now, do you want to blot out and stop that kind of business?

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator through?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I still insist that no corporation should be permitted to hold stock in any other corporation. I am aware of the fact that the practice has been indulged in so long that nothing I can say will in any wise change the practice, but I am here to assert that fully 50 per cent of the corporate abuses of the country, of which the people justly complain, and which require us to enact legislation for their removal and to bring all corporate and commercial lines engaged in interstate trade within the restraining influences of national legislation, are due to practices beginning with such "necessities" as the Senator from North Carolina has referred to, and expanding from those beginnings into all avenues of commercial life, until to-day every corporation that is of any consequence counts as part of its assets not only the stock, but through that stock the control, of corporations engaged in the same and in other lines of business.

Mr. President, it may be, and doubtless is, true, as the Senator from North Carolina has stated, that the cotton-manufacturing industry has been largely promoted by the practices to which he refers; but that business, if there was a demand for it—and no doubt there was—could have been and would have been, if the law had not permitted, as unfortunately it did permit, just such investments, developed along other and more legitimate lines of expansion. That, however, is merely a digression.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Aside from the policy of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he thinks the Congress of the United States has the authority, under the Constitution, to regulate the ownership of stock in State corporations?

Mr. THOMAS. The Congress of the United States has the right to impose any restriction it sees fit upon the agencies of interstate commerce. My objection to this whole line of proposed legislation is that it does not follow that course. I believe that Congress, in the present emergency, should place certain prohibitive restrictions upon corporations engaged in interstate commerce, one of which would be to prevent their owning stock in other corporations; and of course State corporations, if they carried on interstate commerce, would then be obliged to comply with that requirement or quit doing interstate business.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a brief observation?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. In the Northern Securities case, in One hundred and ninety-third United States, which I reexamined last night, the majority opinion held, in effect, that the ownership of the stock of competing railway corporations engaged in interstate commerce had the tendency and effect of restraining interstate trade and therefore was within the terms of the Sherman antitrust law of 1890.

This amendment, it occurs to me, goes further than that. It prohibits the ownership by one corporation of the stock of another corporation engaged in part in interstate commerce without reference to its effect upon interstate or foreign trade. Therefore it is purely and simply a regulation of the ownership of stock of corporations created by the States, and in my judgment is not only against the majority opinion in the Northern Securities case, but is unquestionably against the minority opinion, delivered by the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the remarks which I submitted for the consideration of the Senate when the so-called trade commission bill was before us I attempted to point out, and I think successfully, and fortified my position by references to such distinguished authorities as the former Attorney General of the United States, that under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution Congress has the power to prescribe the conditions under which the agencies of interstate commerce could transact business. The object of the argument was to demonstrate, if possible, that if that course of legislation were taken the necessity for a trade commission, the necessity for active regulation, the necessity for Federal supervision of the transactions and operations of these great combinations would absolutely disappear, since through compliance with the restrictions of such laws the evils complained of would necessarily disappear, or those agencies would be prohibited from carrying on interstate commerce. I also endeavored to show that we were pledged by our platform to that method of procedure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment.

While I have the profoundest respect for the opinion of the chairman of the committee, who never expresses one upon a subject so important as this until he has fortified himself by a knowledge and a review of the authorities, I am constrained to declare that if we concede that the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its powers under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, can not impose a restriction like this upon corporations engaged in interstate commerce, then we might as well bid adieu to all attempts to control those agencies and seek some other methods of relief from the abuses of which the country so justly complains.

I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Colorado, as well as to the Senator from Texas.

The latter Senator has correctly stated the decision in the Northern Securities case, and he has stated the reason given by the court for its decision. I think, however, he has omitted this element: He has assumed that when we passed a law forbidding restraints of trade we had exercised our full constitutional power to regulate commerce.

It is true that in order to make an act an offense as against the antitrust law we must show that the ownership by one corporation of the stock of another does restrain trade; but that is not our full constitutional power. We can regulate commerce in any way we see fit for the public good; and if we desire to say that one corporation engaged in commerce among the States shall not own the stock of another corporation engaged in commerce, I think we have the full constitutional authority to say so.

I therefore do not look upon the decision in the Northern Securities case as at all impairing the validity of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. So far as I am concerned, I go further. I think we can say that a corporation engaged in commerce shall not hold the stock of any other corporation, whether it be competitive or not. It is a condition that we can impose upon a corporation as precedent to its right to engage in commerce. That question, however, is not up at this time, and it is not necessary to consider it.

I make this suggestion to the Senator from Colorado because the point raised by the Senator from Texas is an exceedingly important one, and if his view is accepted we are pretty nearly at the end of our string. If our present laws are not found to be effective, then the whole experiment would be a failure.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I fully agree with the conclusions just stated so well by the Senator from Iowa. To illustrate the consequences if his position were not substantial, I will take the instance suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], where stock in a cotton manufacturing company is sold to or received by a corporation in Pittsburgh engaged in the manufacture of machinery for the weaving of cotton cloth in exchange for such machinery. Why, it is easily conceivable that the Pittsburgh corporation could demand and receive a majority of the stock in the cotton factory in North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not the case, however. That is not so. They have not done that.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not say it is so. I have not so asserted; but it might be so, and if you acknowledge the right of such a corporation to acquire a single share of stock in the North Carolina company you must concede its right to acquire every share of stock in it, with the result that the concern in Pennsylvania engaged in the manufacture of cotton machinery will also become engaged in the manufacture of cotton cloth through its ownership of another corporation organized under the laws of North Carolina. Now, it is very easy to follow that to its logical consequences and to assume a control not only of one but of every one of the companies in the State of North Carolina by a single concern engaged in the business of manufacturing machinery for weaving cotton cloth. The very moment you recognize the right of one corporation to hold stock in another corporation, whether engaged in the same line of business or not, that very moment you must recognize the right of the holding corporation to own all the stock not only of that company but of every other company engaged in the same business as well as those engaged in other lines of business. It is this vicious principle which lies at the basis of fully one-half of the corporate abuses of which the country justly complains, and which makes it necessary for us to remain here during this long summer season, engaged in the effort to legislate in order to overcome it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. What we should do is to attack this evil at its very source, and until that is done all of our remedial legislation will prove to be palliative, and palliative only. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He was on the Finance Committee when the tariff bill was under consideration a year ago. I wish to ask the Senator if any cotton manufacturers and any cotton-mill owners appeared before the committee and asked them to reduce the tariff on cotton machinery?

Mr. THOMAS. Speaking offhand, I do not recall that any such request came from any source, except from those who were competitively engaged in the manufacture of that class of machinery.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think that is correct; and to me it was very significant that the cotton-mill owners did not appear here and ask to have the tariff reduced on cotton machinery, and I ascribe it to this very ownership of the mills by cotton-machine manufacturers.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not recall that any of the cotton manufacturers down South or up North appeared before us and asked for a reduction of duty upon manufactured goods. I think it was simply a situation where the representatives of each industry, desiring to retain as much duty as possible, were naturally chary of attacking the duty upon the product of other manufacturers whose interests were analogous.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did not the cotton-mill people come before the committee and send a brief, in which they stated that they were perfectly willing to have the tariff reduced on certain classes of goods?

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps they did. I was not on that subcommittee.

Mr. OVERMAN. They did send a brief here, and in it they said the tariff was too high, and they were willing to have the tariff reduced.

Mr. THOMAS. I take the Senator's word for it. It is contrary to my recollection, but I am not going to be distracted from the discussion of the things for which I took the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] interrupted the Senator, and that is the reason why I interrupted him.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not object to the Senator's interruption.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. It is perfectly appropriate to interrupt me whenever the Senator desires to do so. But, Mr. President, let me come again to this amendment, since it is that which I desire to discuss for a moment. The amendment virtually eliminates from section 8 the conditions under which corporations engaged in commerce may acquire the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation. As the paragraph stands the condition will make the prohibition nugatory; as the prohibition stands with the qualification, any corporation engaged in commerce can acquire the whole or any part of the stock of any other corporation by merely asserting that its effect is neither to eliminate nor substantially lessen competition.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not the Senator mistaken there? The bill provides that no corporation shall own stock in another corporation where it substantially lessens competition.

Mr. THOMAS. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have a trade commission for the purpose of investigating that matter. If they find that that is the case, of course the corporation becomes liable.

Mr. THOMAS. We are going to have a trade commission composed of five members. That commission must investigate the complaints of 100,000,000 people. Those complaints will become as thick as the leaves of autumn, and they will be lodged, of course, as rapidly and disposed of as summarily as the limited powers and qualifications of five men may do so. Before it has been in operation six months the commission will be buried completely out of sight by an overwhelming number of complaints of unfair competition, which it will be powerless to dispose of for five years thereafter. That is one of the reasons why I say that the qualification here will practically destroy the purpose and effect of the prohibition. Suppose that I represent a corporation engaged in the manufacture of cotton-cloth machinery. I use that as an illustration, since it has been brought up here. As the representative of that corporation I have an opportunity to obtain a controlling interest in all the mills of northern Georgia engaged in that business, and I do so. I then operate those mills for the production of cotton cloth, and by virtue of their number and of my control of them I can operate them not only in competition with, but practically to the destruction of the other mills in the State. Complaint is made before the trade commission that I have violated this paragraph of section 8 and acquired the whole or a part of the stock of other corporations engaged in commerce, but I will reply that the effect of that acquisition is not to eliminate and substantially lessen competition, and I offer to prove it.

An issue is joined and the controversy then becomes one of fact. In the first place, the question whether I have violated the section or not will then depend upon the judgment of three out of five men. In the next place, the hearing may be postponed and prolonged to such an extent that the controversy will have become stale and unimportant before it can have been decided; and what is worse, Mr. President, I will have the capacity of showing by expert and other testimony that inasmuch as my corporation is engaged in the manufacture of machinery and the corporations which I control are engaged in the manufacture of cotton cloth there is nothing in the two processes which either eliminates or lessens competition between them.

Now, that is one of scores of illustrations easily susceptible of statement which must produce the consequences that will flow from this section when an attempt is made to put it in practical operation.

Mr. President, the Rock Island company is a holding corporation. It holds all the stock of another Rock Island company, which is also a holding corporation, and the second holding corporation holds all the stock of the Rock Island Railroad Co., which is the operating company. There is a condition in which it can be asserted successfully that the holding of the stock of the holding company holding the stock of the railroad company does not lessen competition, does not eliminate competition, and does not create a monopoly. It is a stock-exchange manipulation which has resulted in the bankruptcy and the ruin of one of the finest pieces of railroad property in the United States, but the process would be legitimized under this section if it shall be enacted into law as reported by the committee.

So, Mr. President, if we are going to legislate upon this great subject in such wise as to make our legislation effective, if we are going to legislate in such wise as to bring that relief to the people which they are looking to us to effect for them, if we are going to enact repressive legislation that will repress, then we should eliminate from this proposed amendment such qualifications to the prohibitive clauses of the bill as will make those prohibitive clauses meaningless or easy for adverse construction.

I hope, Mr. President, that my view concerning the operation and effect of this measure, if the amendment is rejected, will prove in the future to have been ill founded. I hope when the law comes into operation it will justify all the expectations of those who have framed it and who are directly responsible for its consideration. But I am unable, Mr. President, to perceive how this paragraph is anything more than a mere legislative poultice to be applied to the exterior—the disease being an internal one—or how it is going to operate otherwise than to defeat and to destroy.

This is a very important measure. Without it the whole scheme of additional legislation falls to the ground. The commission created by another bill and charged with the duty of preventing unfair competition is going to be charged as well with the duty of carrying out and effectuating many of the provisions of this act. If unfair competition is so broad and general and sweeping in its character as to give that body absolute power to prohibit all sources and evidence of unfair competition, let not this bill be so framed as to operate as a modification rather than substantial complement to the original purpose for which we have brought it into existence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but a word of explanation, I think, is necessary. I believe the amendment proposed is a great deal better than the bill as passed by the House. But it has two defects in it which I think it is but fair that I should suggest, because I intend ultimately to offer a substitute for the entire section 8, and I will discuss the subject briefly when I have an opportunity to offer that amendment.

The defects to which I have referred are:

First, the amendment relates only to future acquisitions of stock. I think the law that we pass should relate to the existing situation as well as to future conditions.

Second, the amendment is modified or influenced by the succeeding paragraphs in the section so that a large part of its effectiveness would be destroyed. These paragraphs I have already mentioned and already commented upon to some extent. I do not intend to prolong the debate upon it now. I hope the amendment will be adopted, because if it is and my substitute is not adopted we will have a great deal better law than we shall have if we pass the paragraph as it came from the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a word on this amendment. I find there is a little misunderstanding about it. I want to clear that up, and I will take but a moment to do it.

The amendment does not propose to strike out all of section 8. It applies only to the first paragraph of section 8, and allows the balance of that section to remain unimpaired and unchanged.

Now notice the language, and I call the attention especially of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. The language of the first paragraph of section 8, as I propose to amend it, reads:

> That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce in the same line or lines of business.

It does not prohibit a corporation that manufactures a boiler or an engine from selling it to a cotton factory and taking pay in stock because it is not engaged in manufacturing cotton; it is making boilers or engines. The sole difference, as I view it, between the section as I have asked to have it amended and the section as reported by the committee is that in the bill as reported by the committee the language reads as follows:

> Where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Now, that is a very difficult thing to prove. It constantly brings up a question of dispute, and what I am asking is that we shall furnish an absolute rule and test it by facts easily ascertained. It is easy to ascertain whether two corporations are engaged in the same line of business, but it is wholly a different question to ascertain whether they are actually competing; and I think this would remove the difficulty.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator proposes to say "in the same line or lines of business." I wish to suggest to the Senator this situation: Take a corporation engaged in the manufacture of steel. Suppose another corporation was engaged in the production of iron ore. Would the Steel Corporation be justified under this language in holding stock in the company that produced the raw material?

Mr. REED. I think it would. I think it would not be barred.

Mr. CHILTON. Then does not the Senator think that the difficulty he is trying to get relief from is not met by his amendment?

Mr. REED. It is not met absolutely, and it never will be met, until, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests, we go back to the old common-law doctrine that one corporation can not own the stock of another. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the illustration he uses would not be covered by the language of my amendment it certainly would not be covered by the language I seek to amend. His argument would go as much against that, and even more than against my amendment. I do not claim that this will stop everything. I claim that it will be a long step in that direction.

Mr. CHILTON. I take it, we can go, it is claimed that we can, even further than the Senator from Colorado, and say that the corporation shall not engage in interstate commerce at all, and go back to the doctrine that it shall be done entirely by individuals. That, though, is a matter of policy in meeting the present situation.

Mr. REED. I understand it is a matter of policy, but the Senator does not meet the case by submitting that the amendment which I have now offered will not cover all the cases when he must admit that his objection to my amendment is that it covers more cases than the language it seeks to displace.

Now, Mr. President, I will call the Senator's attention to another matter. The paragraph as amended leaves in the section the qualifying clause that it "shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment, and not using the same, by voting or otherwise, to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition"; so that a bank can loan money upon stocks, investors can purchase stock, corporations can obtain stock in another. They simply can not obtain stock in a company that is doing the same line of business they are doing.

Now, is that wise? A final word upon it. An absolute prohibition was the old common law. It is the rule of right and the rule of reason that can be sustained by arguments too long to repeat here.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me ask the Senator, would it not be better instead of substituting his amendment for the first paragraph of section 8 to add it to that paragraph?

Mr. REED. There would be some conflict, I think, then. I feel sure this will cover it. I want to call the attenion of the Senate to the fact that we are traveling a beaten path here. I have had a very hasty examination made of the statutes of the various States. I do not say it is absolutely accurate, but according to this examination, which I think is, if not entirely accurate, substantially accurate, I find that in 24 States of the Union corporations are not permitted to own stock of other corporations. In a few other States they are permitted to own the stock in certain corporations. That is reached in this way. Where a State has made no provision and where the common law obtains, this rule applies. I read from the case of De La Vergne Co. v. German Savings Institution (175 U. S., p. 54):

> But as the powers of corporation, created by legislative act, are limited to such as the act expressly confers, and the enumeration of these implies the exclusion of all others, it follows that, unless express permission be given to do so, it is not within the general powers of a corporation to purchase the stock of other corporations for the purpose of controlling their management.

Then follows a large number of decisions which are cited.

Mr. President, Arizona has no provision permitting such stock ownership. There is a peculiar provision of that law, however, which was copied by Iowa and was held to give the implied power. Arkansas has no provision for stock ownership; California has none. In the District of Columbia it is expressly prohibited. Florida has no such provision. In Georgia it is expressly prohibited by the constitution. In Illinois mining and manufacturing companies are permitted to hold stock in any one connecting railroad, but the right is limited to that. In Indiana it is permitted in only certain instances. Iowa has no such provision; Kansas has no such provision; Kentucky has no such provision. In Louisiana corporations can hold stock, but they can not vote it. In Maine manufacturing, mechanical, mining, and quarrying corporations may purchase or hold the stock and bonds of other corporations, but the law seems to be limited to those particular corporations. In Massachusetts there is no such provision; in Michigan there is no such provision; in Mississippi it is expressly prohibited. In Missouri there is no provision, except, I think, in one or two instances which rarely occur; otherwise it can not be done. In Nebraska there is no such provision; in New Hampshire a corporation is permitted to hold stock in payment of debts due the corporation, but it must be sold within five years after title is perfected. In North Dakota there is no such provision. In Oklahoma it is expressly prohibited except where the stock is pledged in good faith for a debt; in Oregon there is no such provision. There is some limitation in Rhode Island, but it would take too long to explain it. In South Dakota there is no such provision. In Tennessee construction companies may receive stock in payment for work done. In Texas there is no such provision, but it is claimed there is a right there under the general powers of corporations, which are very broad in this particular respect. Utah has no such provision; Vermont has none; Virginia has no express provision. West Virginia has no provision permitting stock ownership.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is mistaken as to that. As I stated the other day to the Senate, there is an express provision allowing one corporation to own the stock of another under an act of West Virginia. I have forgotten the exact date of that act, but it was passed many years ago.

Mr. REED. This statement I have made was taken from a compilation of the corporation laws of the United States. As I have said, my examination has been hasty, and there is a possibility of an error; but it is safe to say that in more than half the States of this Union stock ownership by one corporation in another corporation is prohibited. It is a wise and wholesome condition of affairs.

We therefore take no radical step here when we say that a corporation shall not engage in commerce if it holds the stock of another corporation engaged in the same line of business, the solitary distinction between the amendment and the text as it comes to us from the committee being that under the committee text the limitation is where corporations are engaged in competition, which is always a difficult thing to prove.

Mr. President, under the subsequent clauses of the bill a corporation may obtain stock in payment of a debt or it may even buy stock in a company in the same line of business if it does not, through the voting of that stock, undertake to create a monopoly in restraint of trade.

Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] called my attention to the law of his State, and in order that he may understand that I have endeavored to be accurate in my statement I will say to him——

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question before he goes to another point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. This proposed amendment forbids corporation A from acquiring stock in corporation B. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if the same effect, so far as the elimination of competition is concerned, would not be accomplished if corporation B was wound up and corporation A bought the property and paid for it in stock of the company? I can not quite understand the reason upon which this provision is founded if its purpose is to prevent the suppression of competition.

Mr. President, it has been said that under the old common law a corporation could not acquire stock in another corporation. But suppose that under modern conditions we find an infinite number of corporations, and suppose, further, that these corporations are now dealt with as individuals and that the customs and usages of business men growing out of trade necessities have recognized that one corporation might acquire the stock in another corporation, is there any good reason why this practice should be condemned by the law?

We sometimes forget that there are two kinds of law and two different courts. There is the court of society, with its rules and regulations which govern men in their intercourse with each other, and the only difference between the rules laid down by society and legal rules is that the latter are enforced by compulsion.

Now, with respect to questions which relate to trade and commerce, my first inquiry is, What are the rules and practices recognized by society and which are in accord with its sense of what is right and just?

If in the development of corporations society has recognized certain usages and practices which are in accord with its sense of justice and its intellectual and moral judgment, Congress should not attempt by some arbitrary law to overthrow these customs and usages and thereby endeavor to check the natural and normal development of society.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, at the moment the very learned Senator from Rhode Island arose to ask his question I was about to state——

Mr. COLT. I beg the Senator's pardon for wandering from the question.

Mr. REED. I was about to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that the authority which I consulted contains a statement which, in order that it may be seen that I have tried to state the rule correctly as to his State, I desire to read:

> No corporation shall be incorporated for the sole purpose of purchasing real estate in order to sell the same for profit, nor shall it, except by a vote of its stockholders regularly had, subscribe for or purchase the stock, bonds, or other securities of any joint-stock company, or become surety or guarantor for the debt or default of such company.

That would not cover the situation exactly; but in reading this through hastily and making up this list that clause was carelessly read. That is all there is to say about it.

Mr. CHILTON. No, Mr. President; the Senator has not been careless; but the law does not state what the Senator thought it stated. What the Senator has read is the law of West Virginia, but that law simply requires the purchase of the stock of one corporation by another corporation to be accomplished by the action of the stockholders and not by the directors; that is all. It allows such stock to be so acquired; in fact, authorizes it; but it must be done by a vote of the stockholders and not by the directors.

Mr. REED. I stated it too broadly; that is all. I want the Senator and everybody else to understand that in making this hasty examination of these laws—and I so stated in advance—there might be some errors.

Mr. President, answering the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who interrupted me a few moments ago with the somewhat remarkable argument that there are two kinds of law, one the law of society and the other the public law, I think I recognize the distinction the Senator means to make, and we all recognize that as to a great many of their acts the people are not governed by the absolute laws of the land; that there is a higher law, and there are higher impulses and higher instincts. The church, the school, and all the moral societies tend to keep mankind upon a high plane, but the fact that the higher law exists has not deterred us from passing laws to prohibit murder, arson, rape, and larceny. Neither has it stopped us from undertaking to regulate the action or to prohibit the power of great combinations.

If we, sir, were to settle this question by the higher law; if the higher law could protect the people of the United States from the aggressions of vast combinations; if it were effective for that purpose there never would have been a combination in this land, for the higher law is, and the common judgment of the people of the United States is, that no concern ever ought to be so great or so powerful as to control the prices of articles the people must buy. The common judgment of mankind, the higher law, is that a man has no more right in the commercial field to create a monopoly and to crush and destroy his weaker rival than a pirate with a ship armed with cannon has the right to sail the high seas and destroy honest merchantmen.

We come, then, to the question of disobedience through all these years to the higher law. That disobedience is manifest and apparent to all. We are seeking to remedy it by a positive law. Does the Senator mean to intimate that if we pass this law we will be overruled in the court of public opinion and that the law of Congress would be nullified? Surely he did not mean that; but if he did not mean that, it is difficult for me to understand just what he did mean.

It is true that corporations have been buying the stock of each other——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator has said with regard to monopoly. I believe, however, that for corporation A to buy stock in corporation B, although they may both be engaged in the same line of business, might be, under some circumstances, a perfectly proper and legitimate transaction. I believe, further, that if corporation A bought the stock of corporation B with an intent to form a combination in restraint of trade, or with an intent to establish monopoly, and thereby to control prices, or to limit output, or to crush competition, then it should be prohibited. Such acts at the present time clearly come under the condemnation of the Sherman Act.

My objection to this detailed legislation is that it covers, in many cases, transactions which are perfectly legitimate. There may be, for example, two cotton mills making the same line of goods, one of which is managed in an inefficient way, so that the stockholders do not get any return upon their investment, while the other is well managed and pays dividends. Is there any harm in one of those corporations buying the stock of the other and thereby protecting the mill which is inefficiently managed?

I agree entirely with the Senator that monopoly should be prohibited; but again I ask if such a transaction as the one to which I have referred is wrong—and I can not see why it is—is there any difference between that transaction and consolidating the two corporations by the actual purchase of the property of one of them? If the wrong consists in the elimination of competition, then we are forced to this conclusion: The elimination of competition is permitted until we reach the corporate unit, but here it must stop.

In other words, you allow individuals to crush each other by competition. You allow the combination of individuals in the form of a partnership which results in the elimination of competition. You allow the combination of partnerships in the form of a corporation, the effect of which is to stifle competition, and then you say at this point: We will stop the elimination of competition, but in effect you do not do this, because you still permit the corporate unit to crush competition by consolidation; that is to say, you forbid the union of A and B corporations by the purchase of stock by A, but you do not forbid the consolidation of the property of these corporations in the hands of A.

Now, I would prevent every purchase of stock or every consolidation which leads to the evils of monopoly or restraint of trade; but my objection to this legislation is that you are forbidding a great many transactions which should be permitted.

Why, Mr. President, the law of cooperation is just as much of a force in our commercial life as the law of competition. The law of cooperation corrects the abuses of cutthroat competition, and the law of competition corrects the abuses of cooperation. Both are essentially monopolistic. Both competition and cooperation seek control, and that is monopoly. Now, the practical question is to cure the evils of both cooperation and competition. You can not eradicate them. You can not destroy either of these great forces which now govern the world of trade and commerce. All you can do is to regulate them. I would prohibit any form of competition or cooperation or combination which was detrimental to the public interest—in other words, any form which enhanced prices, limited output, crushed competition, or which in any other way was detrimental to the public.

Here you have a clear, simple, broad principle to act upon. You have something which the courts can enforce. When, however, you undertake to regulate by law competition with its thousand varieties of form, cooperation with its thousand varieties of form, discrimination in price with its thousand varieties of form, tying contracts with their thousand varieties of form, interlocking directorates with their thousand varieties of form, holding companies with their thousand varieties of form, you are undertaking an impracticable piece of legislation, which will only lead to confusion and injustice, and which is likely to undermine and impair that great fundamental statute which now protects us against the abuses of both competition and cooperation, known as the Sherman Act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it would be impossible for the adoption of this particular amendment to curtail in any way the force of the Sherman Act. The learned Senator will not contend that, although it might be implied from his concluding statement.

I want to say to the Senator that nothing I have said is susceptible of the construction that I hold him to be a friend of monopoly. I do not know where he conceived that thought from any remark of mine.

Mr. COLT. I did not intend to say that. I only intended to say that if I did not agree with the Senator's amendment, he might perhaps think that I indorsed monopoly.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. We can all differ here without differing upon any such ground as that.

Mr. President, there is no reason advanced by the Senator why Congress may not properly stop the holding company which he says exists in a thousand different forms. We know it is one of the greatest instrumentalities of monopoly. There is no reason why we can not stop at their inception certain practices which lead to monopoly; and that is the whole purpose of all these weeks of debate. That is what we are trying to do.

I have this one observation to make: There are great reasons why one corporation should not hold the stock particularly of another corporation engaged in the same line of business. When our corporation laws were originally enacted it was recognized that they might lead to great abuse. Accordingly, it was provided in almost every State of the Union that there should be not less than a certain number of stockholders; that there should be a certain number of directors; that there should be directors who resided locally within the State; the amount of capital stock is limited in many States; the issuance of the stock is limited; the right of the shareholders is guarded; the powers of the officers are circumscribed; and in every case there is an attempt at laws to fix in some manner a degree of personal responsibility upon the management of a corporation.

That is all completely nullified, every one of those safeguards is absolutely stricken down, when you permit the control of corporation A by corporation B, for it is no longer controlled by local men; it is no longer controlled by men having a direct personal responsibility to it, but it is controlled by another corporation which may be in a distant State. When you attach together a vast string of these corporations, you create through the corporate management a restriction upon commerce and a control of trade, and you tend constantly toward the creation of monopoly.

Of course, it is possible to imagine two small corporations where a joint stock ownership might do no harm; but because it might interfere in some trifling degree is no reason why we should not strike a blow with the ax at the root of the tree of monopoly, and this is one of the main roots of the tree. It is no answer, either, to say that the corporation might sell all of its assets to another corporation, or that a corporation might go out of business and its properties might be acquired by another corporation. When that is done, it means an increase of capital stock. It means that there is given to the world knowledge of the fact that the property and the business are thus controlled; whereas, under the method of stock ownership, there has been exercised in this country for years a secret control, and frequently monopoly is almost completely worked out through it.

Let me take one illustration. I will refer to my old friend the Harvester Trust. There was a consolidation there of five companies originally. The consolidation of those five companies was taken by the Supreme Court as a very potential fact showing an attempt to create a monopoly. All of that could have been escaped if they had tied themselves together by a common stock ownership or by the ownership by one of the stock of another.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. REED. Let me go on further with that for just one moment.

That company, in order to market its goods, organized another corporation, every share of the stock of which it owned, and then, through that corporation, sold its goods in every State of the Union. Thus there was but one corporation selling the goods that were produced by a great corporation which was a consolidation of some six or seven other corporations.

Mr. President, what we are trying to do is to stop that sort of thing. The committee is trying to do it. The committee's bill is based upon that. The House of Representatives tried to do it. Their bill is based upon that idea. All I hope to accomplish by the present amendment is to make it much more easy to prove the case.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to add, in connection with what the Senator has just said and as illustrative of the extent to which this abuse may be carried, that the subsidiary corporations of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., which were utilized for the purpose of wrecking that great concern, numbered 326.

Mr. REED. Yes. Now, take that illustration. Suppose the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. had gone out and had bought these railroads and bought them in the open. At once the question would have come before the public and before all the authorities and before the Attorney General of the United States, "Is not the New Haven Railroad acquiring competing lines? Is not the New Haven Railroad creating a monopoly in interstate carriage in that whole section of the country?" The country would have been advised of it; and, moreover, the stockholder would have had some chance to protect himself. When, however, they acquired secret ownership of the majority of the stock of these roads, which were held up before the public as independent companies and the public led to believe that they had competition, they defrauded the whole public, and they were able to practice fraud upon the public and upon the authorities of the law until at last a great calamity brought to the attention of the public the fact that there was mismanagement. Then, digging down below the surface, all these conditions were discovered.

Mr. President, we ought to end this thing. We ought to be brave enough to end it now by legislation that may even seem a little radical to some of us. The sooner we adopt legislation that has an edge to it the sooner these practices will cease. The sooner they cease the less disturbance there will be to business by ending them.

The provision as it is now drawn acts only on the future. There ought to be a provision to act upon present conditions, but I think there ought to be allowed a period for readjustment.

I hope this amendment will be adopted. So far as I am concerned, I have presented it to the best of my ability, and whatever the result is I shall be content.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Missouri takes his seat I would like to make one suggestion to him.

I know it is the desire of the Senator from Missouri to strengthen the statute, and I have no doubt the committee have the same purpose. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], representing the committee, has argued that the section of the statute as written by the committee is the broader and the stronger statute. Of course the Senator from Missouri takes the opposite view.

I think that the views of both Senators can be easily embodied in the bill by a slight amendment, and that the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is valuable in this connection. My suggestion is simply this—if the Senator from Missouri will take this amendment which I hand him and follow me: Let his amendment be embraced in the first part of section 8 just as he has written it, and then simply say:

In the same line or lines of business, and when engaged in different lines of business where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition—

And so forth. So that the paragraph as amended will read as follows:

SEC. 8. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce in the same line or lines of business, and when engaged in different lines of business where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

This would make it unlawful for one corporation to own stock in other corporations where engaged in the same line of business, and also when engaged in different lines of business where it creates a monopoly or lessens competition. It seems to me that embraces both ideas and would materially strengthen the measure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it would be satisfactory to me with that amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments with reference to this amendment.

The House provision and the Senate committee amendment are based upon the argument and the decision in the Northern Securities case, reported, as I have already indicated, in One hundred and ninety-third United States Reports. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri, going beyond that, would prohibit any corporation engaged in part in interstate or foreign commerce from purchasing or acquiring the stock of another corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce. I invite the attention of the Senate to the decision to which I have referred.

The Supreme Court of the United States, composed of nine members, was divided 5 to 4 against the holding company created in New Jersey to hold the stock of these two great railroad companies of the Northwest. The dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice White, now the Chief Justice, was to the effect that the regulation and control of the ownership of stock of corporations created by a State was not a regulation of commerce, because the ownership of such stock was not in itself commerce. Four members of the court on the other side held that the character of ownership of the stock in that case, where competition was destroyed, or where monopoly was created, or where it was possible to create monopoly, was a restraint of trade, and therefore within the purview of the Sherman law.

Mr. Justice Brewer, not agreeing entirely with either side of this controversy in that court, filed a concurring opinion, practically saying that he adopted the result of the majority opinion rather than its argument, and therefore the decision of the court stood five to four.

As I have already indicated, the House bill and the Senate amendments are based upon the decision of the court in that case. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] would have the Congress of the United States, with its power on this subject limited to the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, regulate the ownership of stock in corporations created by the States on the ground, narrowed, so far as the amendment goes, that they were engaged in part in interstate commerce, and without reference to whether competition was destroyed or lessened or trade was restrained or monopoly was created. I submit to the Senate that it is the safer rule to confine ourselves to the admitted power of Congress to regulate transactions which are in themselves commerce and not venture to invade the authority and sovereignty of the States of the Union to regulate matters within the province of those Commonwealths.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, but that the amendment proposed by the Senate committee following the plan of the House will prevail.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask the Senator from Texas if I understood him as saying that the amendment I suggested is acceptable to him.

Mr. CULBERSON. In the hurried examination which I have been able to make of the proposed amendment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just now the Chair wants to say that the proceedings this morning will not be taken as a precedent in the Senate of the United States. There was not a question of doubt about the roll call having been started upon this amendment on Saturday, and the only thing to do was to vote on the amendment this morning as soon as we secured a quorum. The Chair could not entertain any amendment to the pending amendment, because it is being voted upon.

Mr. CULBERSON. I agree with the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understood the Senator from Texas to say that the amendment is satisfactory to him, and that is the reason why I made the suggestion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, no; on the contrary——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question of doubt that the whole proceeding this morning has been irregular. The Chair did not choose to interfere, because Senators desired to discuss the amendment, but the Chair has ruled upon it. Amendments can not be made to the amendment, because the amendment is the pending question, and the yeas and nays have been ordered and partly called.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say just one word. I have the greatest respect for the opinion of the chairman of the committee upon any legal question, but if the opinion he has just expressed be accurate and correct I think nearly everything we have been doing with reference to this bill is in conflict with that opinion. I think there are other clauses of the bill equally in conflict, and I think the trade commission bill is absolutely in conflict with it.

Under the trade commission bill you have undertaken to give them the right to investigate every corporation, and you have given the right to prescribe what they call fair and unfair trade. It is a little too late in this debate to be drawing the line so closely.

Mr. President, I hold to this view. I will not undertake to say that it is correct. I hold to the view that the right of Congress to regulate interstate commerce carries with it the power to do all that is necessary to protect that interstate commerce and see that it flows freely and openly and without obstruction, and that therefore Congress has the power within its discretion to condemn certain acts which are in the nature of consolidations, the reasonable effect of which may be to restrain trade, and that if Congress exercises that power it will not, in my humble judgment, be disturbed by the court.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED.]

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] who is detained by illness. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], who is absent from the Chamber. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAPP. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence at this particular time of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Ashurst	Jones	Norris	Thompson
Borah	Kern	Perkins	Townsend
Bristow	Lane	Pittman	Vardaman
Chamberlain	McCumber	Poindexter	Walsh
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Reed
Cummins	Nelson	Thomas

NAYS—27.

Bankhead	Hughes	Pomerene	Smith, Mich.
Bryan	James	Ransdell	Smoot
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Swanson
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Thornton
Fall	O'Gorman	Shields	Weeks
Fletcher	Oliver	Simmons	White
Gallinger	Overman	Smith, Md.

NOT VOTING—47.

Brady	Goff	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Gore	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Burleigh	Gronna	Newlands	Stephenson
Burton	Hitchcock	Owen	Sterling

Crawford	Lewis	Sherman	Williams
Dillingham	Lippitt	Shively	Works
du Pont	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment which appears on page 39 of the print of amendments. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. —. That the attorney general of any State may, at the cost of the State, bring suit in the name of the United States to enforce any of the antitrust laws.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. My understanding about the matter is that the amendment upon which the vote has just been taken was offered as a substitute for the amendment offered by myself to section 8. Is that correct?

Mr. REED. That is correct. For the time being I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WALSH. That is why I made the inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is right. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 8, lines 19 and 20, strike out the comma after the word "acquisition"——

Mr. WALSH. No. I want to present them separately. The first amendment is addressed only to the words "eliminate or."

The SECRETARY. In line 17, strike out the words "eliminate or."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment is to strike out the words "eliminate or," so that it will read "where the effect of such acquisition is to substantially lessen competition."

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Chair to state that those two words, the words "eliminate or," were stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Then I have another amendment which I indicated at the same time. It is to strike out from the same paragraph, on page 8, lines 19 and 20, the words "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from Montana a question. I understand where there has been a consolidation which may result in a monopoly or which may result in a restraint of trade that is sufficient to bring the act within the purview of the Sherman law. This section, at least as to the practices covered by it, will only have the effect where there is a substantial lessening. I ask the Senator if he does not think by the language of the statute we are absolutely narrowing the rule as laid down in the trust cases?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so, but the question does not seem to me relevant, if I understand it aright, to the amendment which I now offer.

Mr. REED. I am asking only with reference to the other part.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it has some relevancy to some other feature of the paragraph. The amendment now proposed is to strike out the language "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce," because there can be no doubt whatever—it is not a subject for discussion—that that is already covered by the Sherman Antitrust Act. I plead with the Senator not to endeavor to reenact that law nor to make any provision in respect to it lest it would be assumed that the later law would wipe out the earlier one. Listen to section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act It reads:

Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished—

And so forth.

This prohibits one corporation from acquiring stock in another corporation, when the effect of it is to create a monopoly of any line of trade or commerce in any section or community. I should like to hear some one tell how that is not already covered by the Sherman Act, and whether, if we put it in here, we are not in all probability amending the Sherman Antitrust Act, so that it will be no longer punishable under its provisions but will be subject to regulation under the provisions of this act.

I plead with my colleague upon the Judiciary Committee not to permit the act to go in this form.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am utterly unable to understand when the amendment to strike out the words "to eliminate" passed. It was pending, and I offered an amendment as a substitute for it, and the substitute was defeated. Almost instantly I was upon my feet to make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. A statement was made that the amendment had been passed. I want to know when it was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in the chair). On Saturday last, the Chair is informed by the Secretary, just prior to the offering of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, I want to say that I agree with every word the Senator from Montana has said with reference to the necessity of striking out the language that he is now attacking, but I think we ought also to go back to line 8, and in lieu of the word "is" insert "may be," so that the clause would read "may be to eliminate."

I am perfectly willing it shall go by for the present, but I am calling attention to it. I think the Senator from Montana is absolutely right in his construction of this language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SHIELDS. As I understand the Senator from Montana, he would leave out the words "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce," as what they express is embraced in sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman law, and that this might be construed as a repeal of that part of the law. I think the Senator's fears are entirely groundless. If this is to be construed as a repealing statute, it is what is known as a repeal by implication. There certainly is no express repeal. There is no better-settled principle than that an implied repeal will never be presumed unless the last statute is directly and absolutely repugnant to and inconsistent with the former one. Repeals by implication are not favored, and they must appear almost beyond a reasonable doubt before they can be effective.

I think those words are very material, that they are wholesome, and ought to remain in the bill. What we are trying to do is to condemn monopoly, to condemn practices that lead to it, and the proposition now is to strike out all in relation to monopoly in the section.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. If the acquisition of the stock is contrary to the inhibition of this section, the result would be the creation of a monopoly. Is not that already provided for in section 2 of the Sherman Act, and therefore if there is no other objection there certainly is no necessity for this provision in the section.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, that presents a different view of the question. I think there is a necessity for it. The policy of the House in putting section 8 in the bill was in keeping with that outlined by the platforms of the two great political parties, by President Taft in his special message to Congress in December, 1911, after the decision in the cases of the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. It is in keeping with the legislation recommended and advised by President Wilson in his message of last January—that is, the selection of certain specific schemes and devices that are common and ordinary, used by monopolists in forming these combinations, and penalize them. I believe this provision ought to be retained with the criminal penalty. If we strike out all in regard to monopolies in the section, then there is no prohibition of such schemes for the purpose of creating monopoly, and there is no chance hereafter to restore the penal clauses to prohibit the acts therein denounced. Therefore I think these words should not be stricken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to emphasize the statement made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. It seems to me that we ought not to incur the hazard which we certainly will incur if we leave these words in the paragraph. I think it will have the effect of repealing the antitrust law, so far as monopolies are created through the medium of the holding of stock by one corporation of another. We will have substituted another law for a monopoly so created whenever we pass this statute, and we will have put the enforcement of the law in that respect in the hands of a commission. We will have taken it out of the antitrust law, where it is enforceable through the Attorney General in a civil suit or through a criminal prosecution, and will have put these monopolies so created in the hands of a commission.

While I believe that a commission can perform the most important function in the regulation of commerce, I do not want to give to the commission the enforcement of a statute against a monopoly, for there is no difficulty whatever in perceiving a monopoly and understanding what it is when once the facts are known. Moreover, these words add nothing to the preceding statements in the paragraph. As it is now, I understand, it reads:

> That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Can any Senator here conceive of an instance in which a monopoly is created in which competition is not substantially lessened as between two corporations? Even if it were not in conflict with the antitrust law, it is a reiteration. When you prohibit the substantial lessening of competition by the acquisition of stock, of course you prohibit a monopoly, because monopoly is the suppression of competition. Why, after you have prohibited the lesser thing, do you find it necessary to go forward and prohibit the greater thing? The injunction against the lessening of competition, of course, reaches every case of an alleged monopoly and reaches a great many others. So I hope, for the sake of the integrity of the antitrust law, as well as the proper expression of this proposed law, the last clause may be stricken out.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he knows of any authority holding that a statute can be repealed by implication where the subsequent statute is not repugnant or in conflict with the former one, or, further, that a reiteration of a former statute repeals it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I know of a great many authorities which hold that if a statute passed to-day is inconsistent with a statute passed 20 years ago the statute adopted to-day governs and repeals entirely or pro tanto the statute of 20 years ago.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly; but that is not the proposition. This proposed statute is consistent with the Sherman law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am asserting that it is inconsistent in this: That it declares the prohibition, and then says that the prohibition shall be enforced through the Federal trade commission, whereas in the antitrust law a prohibition is declared, and it is to be enforced through the administration of the Department of Justice, either through a civil suit or a criminal suit. Those two statutes are inconsistent with each other.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator think that providing a cumulative remedy for an existing statute repeals it? I have always thought that it was almost equivalent to a reenactment to provide a new method for the enforcement of a statute, and that is all the trade commission bill does if it does anything.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator assumes that this is a cumulative remedy, then nothing remains to be said, but that is assuming the very proposition in controversy. Is it a cumulative remedy or is it an independent and substituted remedy? This is the view that I have taken of the matter: As it can add no strength to the statute, why should we incur the risk that we must inevitably incur if we pass it in its present form?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I want to say a word with reference to that, too. We have given to this Congress, and to the country that is awaiting the passage of this bill, the most solemn assurance over and over again that these remedies are not cumulative to those already provided by the law for violations of the Sherman antitrust law. We have declared that the antitrust acts which Congress is now considering deal with matters which are entirely outside of the Sherman antitrust law and not reached by its provisions at all. When we had the trade commission bill under consideration we were accused time and time again of givng an alternate remedy to the Government in relation to violations of the Sherman antitrust law, and over and over again the assurance was given from this floor that nothing of the kind was contemplated by that legislation at all.

It was said that the Attorney General would have a choice, under the law, whether he should proceed to enforce the Sherman antitrust law in accordance with its original provisions or whether he should hale offenders against that law before the trade commission for the purpose of punishing them as therein provided. We told the Senate again and again that that was not the purpose, that the two were intended to cover practices that were essentially different. So here, Mr. President, we are endeavoring to pass a law not for the purpose of giving a cumulative remedy for enforcing obedience to the Sherman antitrust law, but we are endeavoring to deal with a situation entirely outside of that law.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Alabama will pardon me until I finish this thought, I shall then be glad to yield to him.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] will certainly agree with me that if we should reenact section 2 of the Sherman antitrust law, but put another penalty there, if we should provide, for instance, a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment for not exceeding six months, to that extent the later law would be a repeal of the former law. The former law provides for a fine not to exceed $5,000 and imprisonment not to exceed one year. We could reenact the substance of the law, but provide a different penalty. Undoubtedly the later law would repeal, to that extent, the former law.

Here, Mr. President, we practically repeat the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, so far as the creation of a monopoly by the acquisition of the stock of one corporation by another corporation is concerned, and we provide another way for bringing to bar those who shall violate its provisions. It becomes a most serious question as to whether Congress intends that as a cumulative remedy, as an additional method of securing the observance of the provisions of the antitrust law, or whether it is believed that the present provisions are too harsh and they ought to be relieved by substituting this present method of enforcement.

I sincerely trust that that impression shall not get abroad, and I do feel as if there can scarcely be a doubt that that will be the construction that will be given to this provision if we allow this language to stand in the bill, for which, I daresay, no one here upon this floor can give any reason.

Now, Mr. President, I should be very glad to answer the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, there seems to be some conflict of opinion between Senators—and between Senators, too, who are lawyers—on the subject as to whether or not the amendment of the Senator from Montana will impinge upon the Sherman antitrust law. That being so, would not the failure to adopt the Senator's amendment have the effect of holding both statutes in abeyance until the courts have passed upon the question?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not understand that it is contended on the part of anybody that the amendment offered by myself impinges upon the Sherman antitrust law. It is agreed, I think, by all, and I think certainly by the Senator from Tennessee, that to eliminate this language will leave the Sherman antitrust law, so far as the organization of monopolies is concerned, in its full force and vigor.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, however, as I understand the matter, that it will remain in its full force and vigor and that we provide an additional and a cumulative remedy for enforcing the observance of its terms.

Mr. WHITE. Does the Senator from Montana deny that?

Mr. WALSH. I think that the effect would be to make this the only remedy. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. WHITE. That is contrary to the views of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. The thought I am trying to convey to the Senator from Montana is that with that conflict of opinion as to the effect of the two statutes, if the Senator's amendment is not adopted, will it not probably have the effect of holding both statutes in abeyance until the courts can pass upon the matter?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, of course the question will undoubtedly be raised, but I am not able to say whether proceedings will be arrested or not. I desire, however, to call attention to one further thought in this connection.

It may be remarked that the bill as it originally came from the other House took particular pains that no such evil as I now point out would be likely to occur or could now occur, because there was a penal provision attached as to anyone who should undertake to create a monopoly in this way, through the acquisition of the stock of one corporation by another corporation. They took particular pains to provide exactly the same penalty for the organization of a monopoly in that way as they provided for the organization of a monopoly under the original Sherman Act; in other words, the penal clause provided that the offenders should be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year; and the present bill contains exactly the same penalty. But now, Mr. President, we have taken those penalties out, and we have provided for the enforcement of this provision through the trade commission. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if he believes there is a necessity for this cumulative remedy for the prevention of the monopoly denounced by the Sherman Act, and whether he favors a cumulative remedy?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not favor a cumulative remedy in the form of an injunction issued at the instance of the trade commission. I favor criminal penalties in order to prohibit and prevent these acts of monopoly. I only say that the effect of giving the trade commission control over these matters is cumulative and that the Sherman law remains in full force and effect.

Mr. WALSH. Then, let me inquire of the Senator from Tennessee, assuming that the provisions for the enforcement of these sections by the trade commission shall remain in the bill, does he feel that we ought to provide a cumulative remedy?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do; because the method pointed out by the trade commission bill to suppress monopolies, with all the uncertainties that attend it, to me seems absolutely insufficient for that purpose. As I have just said, I believe in criminal penalties to suppress monopoly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me, in order that I may ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question, which I think I may ask with some grace, in view of the fact that I stood with the Senator in trying to keep in the criminal provision. So long as the criminal provision was in this section, that criminal provision was identical with the criminal provision which is attached to the Sherman Act. Then if we repeated the language of the Sherman Act here, the repetition made no difference, because there was the same penalty. Now that that penalty has been taken out and the enforcement of this section has been put into the hands of the trade commission, does not the Senator fear that unless we make it plain it may be held that we have taken that particular thing out of the Sherman Act by this new and later section and transferred it over to the trade commission? I am offering that suggestion for the Senator's consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not, because it is not inconsistent with the Sherman law, and would, as I think, merely provide a cumulative remedy.

Mr. President, I was aware that it was insisted upon the floor when we were considering the trade commission bill that it occupied an entirely new field and had no reference to the Sherman law; that it did not concern restraints of trade or monopolies, but related solely to competition among dealers. I understood that to be the position taken by the advocates of that measure. But the arguments made in behalf of the bill are, unfortunately, not a part of the statute, and the court can not consider them when it comes to construe it. As said in the case of United States against Trans-Missouri Freight Association:

> Debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body.

The courts will look to the vague, uncertain, and undefined language of the act, and no one can tell what construction will be placed upon it.

That is simply a reiteration of a well-known rule. I know the argument was made, but I do not agree with it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, if the language sought to be stricken out is, as is contended, a specification under section 2 of the Sherman law of 1890, I see no objection to it, particularly in view of the dissenting opinion in the Northern Securities case, which this provision may be intended to cover. The Senate does not know, nor does the country know, what may be the final decision upon that question by the Supreme Court. The dominating judicial character in that case was the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. His dissenting opinion in that case indicates that he has not changed his views on this question, and we do not know but that there may be a change of attitude by the Supreme Court upon it, as there was on the original general construction of the Sherman antitrust law. So, for that additional reason, I see no objection to reiterating the declaration of the Congress that monopolization of commerce or any part of commerce by this method shall be unlawful and illegal.

I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that the remedy provided in section 9b is merely cumulative of existing remedies. In the report which I happened to write for the committee I at least expressed my opinion when I said, at page 41 of the report:

> All the remedies provided in the bill and amendments are cumulative.

Mr. President, that was said after a full consideration, on my part at any rate, of the bill. In substantiation of that, I call attention to the language of section 9b. So much of it as is pertinent declares:

> SEC. 9b. That authority to enforce compliance with the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of this act—

It originally read sections 2, 4, 8, and 9—

> by the corporations, associations, partnerships, and individuals respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: In the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows.

Mere authority is thus granted by section 9b of the bill, Mr. President, for the enforcement of the act, not exclusive authority, but authority in addition to the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law and other antitrust laws. For these reasons, hurriedly stated, I agree with the position taken by the Senator from Tennessee in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEN-

ROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. BRISTOW. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GORE. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Ashurst	Cummins	Perkins	Walsh
Bristow	James	Pomerene	White
Chamberlain	Jones	Reed
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Shively

NAYS—38.

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike from the bill, in section 8, all of paragraph 2 after the word "commerce," in line 14, so that if amended the paragraph will read:

> No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce.

The amendment simply brings up the question whether or not we are going to authorize or denounce holding corporations. I do not know of any place in the industrial world for a holding corpration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the amendment be stated by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 8, line 23, after the word "commerce," it is proposed to strike out:

> Where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as before and vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as heretofore, and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, the yeas are 20 and the nays are 26. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLLIS. Under the terms of my pair I have the right to vote to make a quorum. I vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Still a quorum has not voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the roll be called.

Mr. REED. I submit that the result has been announced, and that there is no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas are 21, and the nays are 27. Senators COLT and MYERS having announced their pairs and not voting, there is a quorum present, and the amendment of the Senator from Montana is rejected.

The vote by yeas and nays, the result of which was announced by the Presiding Officer, is as follows:

YEAS—21.

Ashurst	Jones	Pittman	Thompson
Bristow	Lane	Poindexter	Vardaman
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Pomerene	Walsh
Gore	Lewis	Reed
Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Shields
James	Norris	Thomas

NAYS—27

Bryan	Gallinger	Overman	Smoot
Burton	Hughes	Perkins	Sterling

Chilton	McCumber	Shafroth	Thornton
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	White
Cummins	Nelson	Simmons	Williams
Fletcher	Oliver	Smith, Mich.

NOT VOTING—48.

Bankhead	du Pont	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Fall	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Brady	Goff	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Gronna	Owen	Stephenson

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, to make paragraph 2 comport with paragraph 1, I move to strike out the words "eliminate or," appearing in line 16, page 9, so that that likewise shall read:

> Where the effect * * * is to substantially lessen competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, at the end of the line, it is proposed to strike out the words "eliminate or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. NELSON. I call for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask for the yeas and nays. A division will be fruitless.

Mr. WALSH. Without calling for the yeas and nays, then, I move, and simply desire a vote, to strike out the words "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce" appearing in lines 19 and 20, on page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Montana that the other matter has not been disposed of. There was a demand for the yeas and nays, and the Chair thinks enough Senators seconded the motion to entitle the Senator to it. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the roll is called, I hope the Senate will understand this amendment. We have taken those words out of the preceding section. This simply makes the language of the second section conform to the language used in the first section.

The second section applies to holding companies alone. I do not know why the Senate wants to preserve a holding company, and certainly I do not know why the language should be any broader with reference to a holding company than it is with reference to an ordinary corporation holding the stock of another company.

We are voting here to-day with a few Senators listening to the debate, with a large number of Senators in the cloak room and in the restaurant or elsewhere, who come in and vote without knowledge as to what is before the Senate. I do not wish to criticize about that. It is not my amendment. It is the amendment of the Senator from Montana. It simply makes the language conform to the amendment which has already been accepted as to section 1. I do not know why it should not come out of this section, as it was taken out of section 1.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am somewhat confused. Two amendments are offered by the Senator from Montana. On his first amendment there was a viva voce vote, and I called for a division, and afterwards a yea-and-nay vote was called for, and pending that, he has offered another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that the second amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. NELSON. We are voting on the first amendment then?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the first amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the words "eliminate or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that that is the pending amendment. On that the yeas and nays have been called for and ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer as before and vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as before and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent from the city and is paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BRISTOW (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and will allow my vote to stand. I ask that this announcement may apply to all other votes I may cast to-day.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ashurst	Hughes	Pittman	Smoot
Bankhead	James	Poindexter	Swanson
Bristow	Jones	Pomerene	Thomas

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I repeat the motion I made a few moments ago, to strike out the following, being the concluding portion of paragraph 2 of section 9, beginning in the reprint on page 9, lines 19 and 20:

Or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as heretofore announced and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement which I made upon the last roll call as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and ask to be counted as present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Ashurst	Dillingham	Pittman	Walsh
Bristow	James	Pomerene	White

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I move, in line 8, section 8, page 9, to strike out the word "is" and in lieu thereof to insert the words "may be."

My reason for that is found in these words in the brief of the Government——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Senator from Missouri to permit the Secretary to state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 2, after the word "capital," it is proposed to strike out the word "is" and to insert the words "may be," so that if amended it will read:

Or other share capital may be so acquired.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I will ask what print the Senator has.

Mr. REED. I have the print of July 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the original print.

Mr. POMERENE. It does not read that way in my copy, and it will lead to confusion in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I refer to line 8, section 8, page 9. The first word in the line is "is."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What print has the Senator?

Mr. REED. The print of July 22.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the new print it is on page 9, line 8, section 8.

Mr. REED. I do not care which print we are applying it to so that we get the amendment I desire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The same language is on page 8, line 18. Probably the Senator would move it in both cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that, to avoid confusion, the clerks at the desk have all the time been using the original print as reported by the committee.

Mr. REED. Very well. In view of that, I refer now to the original print. My amendment is to strike out the word "is," in line 17 on page 8, and to insert in lieu of the word "is" the words "may be," so that the paragraph, if amended, will read:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of any corporation engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition may be to eliminate or substantially lessen—to substantially lessen competition.

As it reads now—

My reason for offering the amendment is this: The law, as I understand it, is that a combination is illegal where the effect may be as well as where it is. I understand that the chairman of the committee is prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Now, in the second paragraph, in order to make it conform, I move to make the same change in line 25 of the old print, page 8.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is line 16, page 9, of the new print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, strike out the word "is" and insert the words "may be."

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he is going to offer an amendment to section 8?

Mr. WHITE. No; I am not.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have one to offer to section 8.

Mr. WHITE. I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The second paragraph of section 8 prohibits holding companies, and is placed in the bill for that express purpose, as I understand it. The language of it as now amended is as follows:

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Mr. President, this section being for the express purpose of prohibiting holding companies, I think it ought to do so absolutely. As it now reads it only prohibits them when such holding substantially lessens competition. I therefore move to strike out the word "substantially," on page 8, line 25, and page 9, line 1, so as to absolutely prohibit holding companies where the acquisition of such stock, to use the language of the bill, may be to lessen competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, second paragraph, bottom of page 8, line 25, and top of page 9, line 1, strike out the word "substantially," so that if amended it will read:

Or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise may be to lessen competition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have an amendment to section 9 of the original print. It is section 10 of the new print of the bill. I will read from the old print on page 12.

Mr. SHIELDS. I had not concluded with section 8, if the Senator from Alabama will bear with me.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move an amendment of the same kind as to the first paragraph of section 8, in line 15; that is, to strike out the word "substantially."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the first paragraph of section 8, page 8, line 17, strike out the word "substantially."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer a substitute for section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 8 insert:

SEC. 8. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall own, hold, or acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the shares of capital stock of a competing corporation engaged also in commerce.

No corporation shall own, hold, or acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock of two or more corporations engaged in commerce in competition with each other.

A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I will ask the Senator from Washington if this very amendment has not been voted down twice?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has not been. It has not been offered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know, but the amendment is in the exact terms of amendments offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. It has been voted down.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is mistaken. This amendment has not been offered by anyone.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not the amendment itself, but the exact words of the amendment were voted down.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is mistaken about that. No one has offered it. Some portions of it have been offered at different times. For instance, the committee amendment proposed to strike out the penal provisions of the section.

Mr. OVERMAN. That has been voted down.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Furthermore there are various other differences between this amendment and the several portions of it which have been offered at other times. It has not been offered and it has not been voted upon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know it has not been offered, but the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri was in almost the exact language in the first paragraph. The second paragraph in regard to the penalty has been voted upon twice and voted down.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad indeed to have the views of the Senator from North Carolina upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I stand corrected if the Senator thinks they are not the same. I think they are.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I call the attention of the Senator to the difference. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri proposed to prohibit the ownership of stock in a corporation engaged in similar business. The amendment which I propose does not contain that language at all. It prohibits the ownership of stock in a competing corporation. It does not go as far in that respect as the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. To illustrate the substantial difference between the two——

Mr. OVERMAN. I see the difference, but they are practically the same.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To illustrate the substantial character of that difference, take a railroad company. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri would prohibit a railroad company from acquiring the stock in a connecting line or an extension. The amendment which I propose would only prohibit it from acquiring stock in a parallel line or competing line. The amendment makes definite and certain the prohibited act. It leaves out the indefinite and uncertain measure of what constitutes a substantial lessening of competition and prohibits in plain and definite terms the acquisition of stock by one company in a competing corporation or by one company in the stock of two competing corporations. When the act is made definite and certain as proposed by this amendment it would be easy to enforce it by a penal provision.

I am inclined to agree with the amendment proposed by the committee to the original bill striking out the penal clause because the act prohibited there was so involved and so uncertain as to be practically incapable of being enforced by the conviction of anyone for crime for its violation.

I am not going to detain the Senate in arguing the amendment; the principles involved in it have been discussed in connection with various other amendments which have been offered; but it is a well-recognized fact that the absorption of the stock by a competing corporation is one of the most injurious agencies by which monopoly has been established in this country. If we are going to condemn that act, we ought to condemn it and not leave it open to evasion and to absolute defiance on the part of those who wish to establish monopoly by setting up a vague and uncertain measure as to whether it is a substantial lessening of competition.

If we are not going to prohibit the ownership of stock in a corporation by another corporation altogether, I do not see any better rule that can be adopted than to adopt the rule of prohibiting ownership of stock in a competing corporation, because the principal evil at which this bill strikes is to prevent monopoly and to maintain competition.

I wish to call attention to the principle which has guided the courts and, I suppose, upon which the rule of the common law was based. The rule itself has been spoken of here, which prohibits ownership of stock in a corporation by another corporation. The reason for this rule is this very thing, which I have just spoken of, that such corporate stock ownership is an easy and effective agency of monopoly.

On page 607, in a portion of section 4056 of volume 4 of Thompson on Corporations, it is said:

> The law recognizes the acquisition by a corporation of stock in another corporation as tending to create monopolies, and therefore condemns it as unlawful, or, at least, requires courts to act with great caution and not to hold that the power was rightfully exercised in any given case, unless it clearly appears to have been an innocent and fair exercise of the corporate power.

In section 4067 of the same work the principle underlying this rule is further discussed, as follows:

> Whether or not the courts will concede the validity of the purchase or acquisition by one corporation of the stock of another may depend to some extent on the purpose of such acquisition. If the acquired stock is that of a competing corporation, and the evident purpose is to gain control of such corporation, then the courts will look upon the transaction with no degree of tolerance. In an action to enjoin one railroad company from purchasing the stock and property of an insolvent railroad company, and thereby obtaining control, and with a view of uniting the property, business, and management with that of the purchasing company, the court said that the transaction must be regarded as an agreement to buy stock and bonds and unsecured debts of an insolvent corporation, and that, irrespective of the assumed ulterior objects in the purchase, it was not even suggested that it was legitimate. The court also took notice that the railroad whose stock was purchased was a narrow-gauge road, and that the rolling stock could not be adapted to a use of the purchasing corporation.

That brings to my mind another evil which the adoption of this amendment, which I think is necessary to render the section effective at all, would prevent, and that is not simply the prevention of monopolies, but it is to prevent wrong and injury to the minority stockholders of the corporation whose stock is acquired by the dominant corporation. A great many corporations have been purchased by other corporations for the sole purpose of absolutely destroying the value of them and of their property and franchises and stock. I have in mind one case, the Rock Island Railroad, acquired by the Harriman interests, because they owned a competing line; they loaded it with debt, although acquired at a time when its stock was above par in the market. It was one of the most valuable railroad properties in the United States, stock whose par value was $100 a share, and which had been selling at $150 a share.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In a moment.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator said the interest thus acquired was the Rock Island. I ask him if he did not mean the Alton?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I mean the Rock Island. The Alton is another case. There are so many cases that it is difficult to select the most prominent or pertinent of them.

In the case of the Rock Island what did they do with this property whose stock was worth $150 a share? They loaded it with debt and when they had accomplished their purpose turned it over to their successors without money enough to buy the necessary equipment for the road, and the consequence is that that stock is now selling for less than a dollar a share in the market. The stock value of that corporation, which was subject to the devouring influence of a great competing corporation which was allowed under the law to acquire it, was absolutely destroyed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator if that was not worked out through the device of a holding company or several holding companies?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Other devices and agencies also entered into it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the evils to the stockholders which the Senator has just mentioned might all be present and yet the act not come within the purview of the amendment as he has it prepared. I wanted to ask him if he does not think in view of his last argument he ought to strike out on line 7 of his amendment the words "in competition with each other," so that the clause would prohibit the holding by one company of the stock in two or more companies, regardless of whether those companies were in competition with each other or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the idea which the Senator has in mind is that while they might not be in competition with each other, one of them might be in competition with the acquiring company. Is that the idea?

Mr. REED. My idea is that if these evils are worked to the stockholders through one company having acquired the stock of other companies and then they proceed to wreck the company, unless we prohibit the holding company altogether that evil can go on. The Senator's amendment does not prohibit the holding company altogether; it simply prohibits the holding company in case the companies acquired are competitive. I want to go further than the Senator and stop the holding-company business altogether.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is rather involving two separate propositions in his suggestion. In the first place, I want to say that I am willing to go as far as the Senator proposes. In fact, I think the Senator offered an amendment to that effect a moment ago, and I voted for it; but the Senate voted it down; and not being able to go so far, on account of the action of the Senate, I propose to go as far as we can, or at least to submit to the Senate a proposition which would go further than the bill as it is now framed, although it does not go as far as the Senator proposes. So much for that.

Furthermore, as to the evil which the Senator suggests, I would say that if you remove the motive and the interest which comes from the competition of the acquiring company, or of two companies whose stock is acquired, you will probably prevent the evil which the Senator speaks of. It is not very likely that a company which has no interest, no motive in the business of some company whose stock it would acquire, would seek to destroy its business.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, on the contrary, these holding companies have been the common device employed by scoundrels, not always for the purpose of putting together competing companies, but for the purpose of stock jobbery and stock speculation. They take a company like the Rock Island, with its stock up to $150, and they put another railroad or two in with it that may or may not be competing. All that stock is put into a holding company. Then the holding company proceeds to issue stocks and bonds of its own and sells those stocks and bonds upon the theory that they have a great earning capacity through the stock holdings which they own in a proprietary way. Then, as in the case of the Rock Island, they sometimes organize a holding company for the holding company. Thus they pyramid this monstrous scheme until it breaks with its own weight. The primary object is not the lessening of competition; it is stock jobbing and public robbery. And yet we can not get here in the Senate a vote to wipe out the holding company.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this section, however it may be framed—even though it go to the extent the Senator from Missouri had proposed and for which I voted with him—we could not hope would remedy all the evils that he speaks of. The only effect it would have would be to deprive monopoly of one of its instruments. We can not hope that we are going to wipe out monopoly by the adoption of the section, even though it should be in the most perfect form.

There is a great deal of truth in what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] remarked awhile ago, that we are dealing here with only one of the symptoms of monopoly. I would hardly call it the symptom, but we are dealing with one of the instruments of monopoly and, nevertheless, it is one of the most effective instruments of monopoly. There are many ways, even though this section should be adopted in the widest scope, in which competitive companies can be united. They are obvious to everyone. They can be united by the holding of stock of competing corporations by an individual, as is very frequently the case. They can be united through interlocking directorates. They can be united through the ownership of stock in both of them by the stockholders of both of them and joint action in the election of a governing board. But the law has recognized—not only the common law but the legislatures of many of our States—and the courts have given the reason for the rule in construing the action of corporations which they hold to be in conflict with it—that the extension of the powers granted to this artificial being, which are much greater than those of any natural person, through an infinite multiplication of artificial beings operating under one head in different local jurisdictions, affords one of the most effective instruments of establishing monopoly; and we would be doing a good piece of legislation, although we can not prevent the evil altogether in any one piece of legislation, if we deprive them by this section of that one agency.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator intend by his substitute to wipe out the exceptions provided in the original bill, for instance, the exceptions allowing the establishment of subsidiary or branch corporations to do business?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it does not prevent the acquisition of branch corporations.

Mr. PITTMAN. In section 8 of the bill as it now stands there is a provision permitting the organization of subsidiary and branch corporations and for the purchase of stocks solely for investment. If the Senator's amendment was substituted for the text of section 8 there would be no exemption of that kind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; there would be, Mr. President. The fact of the case is that the section itself is an exception, or would be an exception, to the general rule. The general rule would remain as it is now so far as the laws of the United States as a separate jurisdiction are concerned that one corporation could acquire and own the stock in another corporation. The exception would be that they could not do so if the thing acquired was that of a competing corporation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would not such branch corporation appear to be a competing corporation and subject the main corporation to prosecution under your amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is a good deal like some of the legal arguments I have heard in these cases. If it were a parallel competing line, the acquisition of its stock certainly would be prohibited, and that is the evil which we are seeking to prevent. If it were a mere extension or branch line, it would not be affected by this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator. I wish, indeed, to make two inquiries. One is with reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the other is with reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I hope the Senator from Washington will take them both into consideration before he asks us to vote on his amendment. I should like to call his attention to page 9 in the bill, the provision commencing with line 5, which says:

> This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment.

Has the Senator that provision?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have; that is, I see it in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's amendment were adopted, that provision of the bill would be stricken out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Because it is a part of section 8.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Take, for instance, a university. Such institutions often invest their surplus in the stock of corporations, and that ought to be encouraged. They themselves are corporations, but they invest it for investment purposes. If the amendment were adopted without any change, that would be prohibited, I understand.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. I beg the Senator's pardon. I appreciate the pertinency of the Senator's suggestion. It was argued a few days ago when I gave notice of this amendment, and the same proposition was suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in an amendment of which he gave notice, and by the Senator from New Hampshire, who made some inquiry in regard to it.

The amendment which I have offered would not prevent a college or a savings bank from investing its funds in the stock of corporations; the general rule would remain as it now is; just as I said a moment ago in regard to the broader question, that they could invest in the stock of corporations with the exception that they could not invest in the stock of a competing corporation or in the stock of two corporations competing with each other. There is only that exception, and I think there ought to be that exception for two reasons: In the first place, if it is an evil it ought to be prohibited under all circumstances; and, in the second place, from the standpoint of the investor, there is an ample field for investment without invading the principle which prompts the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am in entire sympathy with what he wishes to accomplish. I am opposed to the holding company as it is ordinarily used, and I should like to prohibit it; but the Senator himself will see that his amendment, if adopted, would prohibit a college or a savings bank from investing in the stock of competing companies. Suppose a university or a college invested some of its funds in the stock of some railroad company; that they had some more funds and wanted to invest them; that they liked that kind of an investment, for it had been profitable; they would be prohibited from investing in any railroad company which competed with the first. It might be difficult to determine whether the other company in which they were thinking about investing was, in fact, in competition with the first one; and yet they would have to determine that at the peril of being fined under a criminal statute.

It seems to me the object which the Senator wishes to reach would be accomplished if he would make that exception, and then strike out, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in his amendment, in lines 7 and 8, the words "in competition with each other"; that is, where a corporation is a holding company it should not be permitted to purchase the stock in two or more corporations engaged in commerce. That would remove any doubt. If that change were made, and the exception which I have suggested were put into the proposed law, it seems to me the evil would be eradicated.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. I am speaking with the permission of the Senator from Washington. Nobody wants to prohibit a savings bank or an individual or an institution investing their funds in the stock of corporations, whether they are competing or not, if they do not use that method for controlling the corporations; in other words, no one would object to a college or a savings bank owning stock in different corporations if it were purely for investment purposes and the institution did not exercise the voting power of the stock of those corporations for the purpose of creating a monopoly.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to suggest that I do not think Congress has power to regulate or control the kind of corporations spoken of by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr NORRIS]. Such corporations are not included in this proposed act. Under this act only corporations engaged in interstate commerce are affected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama is a very sound one, except where such corporations by purchase of stock or otherwise become connected with interstate commerce.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the hour of 4 o'clock will soon be here, when the debate will become very circumscribed. To bring this particular matter to a head and to end this phase of the debate—and I know that some of us at least feel like supporting this proposition—I want to ask the Senator from Washington if he would not accept these two amendments to his amendment: In lines 7 and 8 to strike out the words "in competition with each other," and before the penalty clause to insert:

> This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to control in whole or in part such corporation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that that proposition has once been voted on by the Senate, and been voted down, I should like to submit to the Senate this somewhat different proposition and get a vote upon it.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would vote for the proposition that is stated by the Senator from Missouri; I agree with him in it; but I should like to submit the matter in this other form also.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The suggestion advanced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] I think was not fully appreciated. I think the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] answered it by assuming that the prohibition extended only to corporations engaged in commerce among the States. I think, however, if the Senator will look at his own amendment he will see that the prohibition extends to every corporation, whether it is engaged in commerce or not. If he will look at the second paragraph of his amendment he will find that it is general.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To which part of the amendment does the Senator from Iowa refer?

Mr. CUMMINS. I refer to this part of the amendment:

> No corporation shall own, hold, or acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock of two or more corporations engaged in commerce in competition with each other.

The prohibition against the holding company extends to all corporations, whether they are engaged in commerce or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; but the prohibition is the prohibition of acquiring the stock of a company engaged in commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Now, while we have a right to regulate corporations that are engaged in commerce, we have no right to regulate corporations that are not engaged in commerce unless those corporations do something that interferes with or restrains trade or commerce. That is true, is it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; but when a corporation acquires stock in a corporation engaged in commerce, then it has connected itself with commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, does the Senator think that the holding of 10 shares of stock in the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. by a savings bank in New York and at the same time the holding of 10 shares of stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. could be so connected with commerce among the States, and could be held to have such an influence on commerce among the States, as to bring it within the constitutional grant of power?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly. I do not care to go at length into an argument upon that proposition, but I would be willing to undertake to defend the proposition that this Government has the power under the commerce clause of the Constitution to make such laws as it sees fit in regard to who shall own or control the stock of corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not disputing the general principle; but it has always seemed to me that in order to bring such an instance within the constitutional power there must be some effort to control the two corporations engaged in commerce, or that the effect of the holding must be necessarily or reasonably to control the two corporations which ought to compete with each other. It is for that reason that I have thought all the while that the language suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] just now—which I may say is found in the substitute which I shall offer presently for section 8—is rather necessary in order to make the prohibition clearly and unmistakably constitutional.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, I am not sure whether that has been voted upon or not; but I want to submit to the Senate a clear, unqualified proposition of prohibiting the corporate ownership of stock in competing corporations engaged in commerce.

I will add to what I said a moment ago as to the legal phase of it, that Congress can regulate the character of all corporations engaged in commerce; it can specify how they may be formed and what jurisdiction may give them their charters, and may monopolize that jurisdiction itself, in my judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true, I think, Mr. President; but I ask the Senator from Washington this question: Here are two corporations engaged in commerce and competing with each other. Can Congress say that the Senator from Washington should not hold stock in both companies?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is quite a different proposition, because the Senator from Washington is not a corporation—at least not the kind of a corporation that we are talking about.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the corporation that you are dealing with here in the second paragraph is a corporation over which Congress has no more control than it has over an individual, because it is not engaged in commerce among the States and is not organized under the laws of the United States.

I ask the further question whether the Senator thinks that Congress could say to one of these corporation, or to both of them, that because one man owned some stock in both these corporations therefore neither of them shall be permitted to engage in trade among the States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this legislation is aimed at a recognized evil and one which has been denounced by the courts. Like many other criminal laws, if it is desired that it shall be effective at all it is necessary to make it without exception. I will cite an instance. Take the game laws, for example, which prohibit any man from having game in his possession at a certain time. The real evil which it is proposed to prevent is not the having possession of the game, because the game might have been acquired lawfully, but it is because the possession of game renders it difficult to enforce the statute which prohibits the killing of game out of season.

If Congress proposes to prevent the establishment of monopoly by the corporate holding of stock in competing corporations, it is in pursuance of a wise principle of legislation to prohibit it altogether, and not to make an exception and say, "If a small amount is held, we will not prohibit it"; in other words, it comes back to a discussion of the terms of the original bill here as to whether or not we shall qualify the prohibition by inquiring whether the inhibited act results in a substantial lessening of competition.

The very purpose of this amendment is to avoid the uncertainty and the ineffectiveness which comes from that sort of qualification and temporizing and compromising with what has been denounced by the wisest judges of the country as one of the means of perpetuating some of the most offensive monopolistic transactions which have injured the people. I wish to read in that connection a paragraph from the opinion of Mr. Justice Day in the case of the United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (226 U. S., p. 86). He says:

> A more effectual form of combination to secure the control of a competing railroad than for one road to acquire a dominating stock interest in the other could hardly be conceived. If it is true, as contended by the Government, that a stock interest sufficient for the purpose was obtained in the Southern Pacific Co., with a view to securing the control of that company and thus destroying or restricting competition with the Union Pacific in interstate trade, the transaction was, in our opinion, within the terms of the statute.

In addition to making the thing prohibited definite and certain the object of this amendment is to restore to the statute the penal clause, because I think it has been demonstrated in nearly all of the trust cases which have been in court, if we are frank with ourselves, that the civil remedies are ineffective and very frequently the burden of the penalty in civil cases falls upon the innocent victims of the transgressors of the law, so there ought to be in this and in other provisions of the antitrust laws provisions by which criminal penalties can be visited upon the individuals who violate them, and in order to attach a penal provision with any sense of justice or logic the statute ought to be made simple and clear.

It will not be difficult for any court to determine whether two companies are competing, but it will be difficult for a court to determine whether they are substantially competing, because what the word "substantially" means will depend upon the individual views of this court or that court or of a jury that may be called to determine the case, and it will be impossible of enforcement.

I ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I announce my pair and its transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GORE. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—16.

So Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out of section 8 all after the word "competition" in line 8, on page 9, down to and including the word "competition" in line 16. I ask that the clause proposed to be stricken out be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 9, line 8, after the word "competition," it is proposed to strike out:

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, we are unable to follow the amendment in the new bill, and I only have a copy of the new bill before me. What page of the new bill is it?

The SECRETARY. It is the third paragraph of section 8, which is on page 9 in the last print. Beginning on line 24, after the word "competition," the Senator from Missouri proposes to strike out the remainder of paragraph 3.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we have amended this section, after going through great tribulations about it, by striking out the words "eliminate or substantially," so that it applies to lessening competition. It applies where competition may be lessened. Now, after having provided that nothing can be done which may lessen competition, we go on in the bill, in the language which I am asking to have stricken out, and provide:

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Mr. President, that simply means to coldly legalize the creation of chains of corporations; to coldly legalize the very thing the Harvester Trust did when it created the Harvester Corporation and made it its selling company; to coldly legalize just such devices as were pursued by the New Haven Railroad; to say that a man can start with a corporation of $2,000 stock, then he can organize another corporation of $2,000,000 and tie it to it, and he can organize 20 other corporations and tie them again to the second one he has organized, and a chain of corporations can be built across a country.

It legalizes all that any trust magnate or organizer of trusts ever ought to ask. It is not necessary. There is not a man whom I have ever heard discuss this question who has offered a good reason for one corporation organizing a dozen other corporations. Now, what is the reason? What good reason can be advanced for that sort of thing? Why should we sanction it?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to remind the Senator that it is precisely in that way that the so-called water-power trusts of the country have been built up—by the creation or acquisition of subsidiary corporations. If any one aspect of corporate monopoly has received the denunciation of thoughtful men, particularly of the Democratic Party, it is this. It is a form of monopoly now receiving consideration in legislation designed to provide for the leasing under governmental control of remaining water powers. It came into being through the system of forming and controlling subsidiary corporations through the agency of central or holding combinations.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

It will be said by the advocates of this measure that there is no harm in it, because it contains the words "when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition." Taking the water-power illustration, here are 100 streams, not one of them harnessed. A concern conceives the idea of getting all that water power under control. It organizes a corporation which builds a dam across a certain river. Then it goes to another stream and builds a dam across the other stream. That would not come within the purview of this bill. There has been no competition; the streams were not in competition with each other, and yet you are gathering under one common management the sole source of natural power.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will say for the information of the Senator that it is just such schemes that are on now in connection with the water powers in the different Western States.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly; and that is not all. The scheme is on now of organizing an electric light company in Town A, another in Town B, and another in Town C, owned by separate companies, subsidiary, however, to one parent company. After that has been done, and 15 or 20 towns have been consolidated in that way under one management, the next step is to get hold of the interurban railroads that are run by electric power in those towns; and in a short while it is absolutely impossible for any institution engaged in any one of those lines to live, because of the power which has been created, and which is too great for them to hope to compete with. Yet the electric light company in each of those towns has not been in competition with any other electric light company in another town in the sense that we use the term "competition."

Mr. President, I am utterly opposed to leaving that language in the bill. It may be that my opposition will have no effect. It may be that we propose to go on here, and on and on, to allow holding companies to exist, to allow interlocking directorates to exist, and now to allow chains of corporations to be created. My opinion is that when we get through with a little more of this kind of legislation the courts will say that by the enactment of it we have given legislative sanction to the very thing that the courts to-day apparently are about to condemn. I hope this language will be stricken from the bill.

Somebody will say that sometimes it is a matter of convenience. Mr. President, I must admit that it is sometimes a matter of convenience. It is sometimes a matter of convenience for a company owning a railroad to be able to reach out and get another railroad. It is nearly always a matter of convenience for one coal company to reach out and get another coal company; but that argument is the argument that lies back of the creation of every trust that ever has been built up. They have always claimed that there was an economic reason back of their creation.

Now, we propose here, as we are enacting antitrust legislation, to legitimatize the creation of a string of corporations, which may be unlimited in number and unlimited in capital, and to impose them upon the country. We may go on doing that, but I will venture the prediction that the people of the United States will finally see to the bottom of this bill, and that when they do they will have something to say about legitimatizing the creation of a string of corporations allied with each other and tied together.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have in mind a so-called holding corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, with a capital of $50,000,000. Its assets consist of the stock of a number of subsidiary companies engaged in the lighting and gas business. One of these corporations is in the State of Missouri, one is in Ohio, one is in New England, one is in Colorado, and still another is in the State of Washington. Now, some of these subsidiary corporations are profitable. Others are not so. The common income from all of them constitutes the fund from which dividends are paid and the interest charges of the parent company are met.

The corporation in Colorado, which pays 20 per cent, say, upon its capitalization, is therefore thrown in with a corporation in Missouri, which, we will say, pays nothing, but is operated at a loss. Twenty per cent profit on the corporation in Colorado is too much, and it ought to be reduced; but it is not reduced, since that larger profit is needed to cover the losses in the other subsidiary concerns. They are all tied together; but, as the Senator from Missouri says, there is not and can not be any competition between them.

Mr. President, the holding company is a concern which enables people to do business with concealed weapons. It is the natural offspring of the removal of the old and salutary restrictions which prohibited corporations from investing in the stock of other companies. That is something that ought to be prohibited in any scheme of legislation, and particularly in one which is designed to reach and cover these evils all over the country.

I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be adopted.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, this part of the section is as it came from the House. It was not amended in any way by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It seems to me that anyone who understands the business of the country can defend the position taken by the House and by the Senate committee without being either a trust magnate or a defender of trusts.

There are two or three instances I could give to the Senate, which would show, I think, not only that this provision should not be amended substantially, but that it is eminently proper that anyone who undertakes to deal with the business of the country should keep in mind the things that were in the minds of the members of the committee when they assented to this provision.

For instance, Mr. President, the laws of many of the States limit the things which one corporation can do. This morning I asked the distinguished Senator from Missouri whether or not the amendment as to which he was then addressing the Senate would cover a case wherein a steel corporation was engaged in business and it bought stock in another corporation that was getting out iron ore. He said no; he did not mean to prohibit that.

Mr. REED. I said I did not think so.

Mr. CHILTON. He said he did not think it would do so. Therefore I take it he did not want it to do so. Suppose you have a law in a State that a steel corporation can engage in no other business. That is what the laws of some of the States provide. This is to cover that kind of a case, so that when people are engaged in the steel business and happen to be in a State which will not allow a steel corporation to engage in the iron-ore business the same men who are engaged in the steel business in an infinitesimal way as compared with the Steel Trust may do in a little way what the Steel Trust does in a big way, because it has an immense organization and immense capital and may get the raw products.

Another instance: I live in a State where a few years ago what are now the rich coal fields of the State were a wilderness. That industry was not built up by the railroads. At one time the coal happened to be in a zone as to which the great railroads of this country said, "It is not yet time to develop the coal fields of West Virginia. Pennsylvania is nearer to the eastern coast, and Indiana and Ohio are nearer to the Great Lakes. Let West Virginia alone." West Virginia was developed not by any trust and not by any railroad, but by the ingenuity and the initiative and the energy and the enterprise of the people within her boundaries.

A man starts in to organize a coal company. His coal land is 10 miles from a railroad. A coal company can not condemn land to build a railroad. The railroad would not extend its lines up to the coal land. The genius and the enterprise of West Virginia formed the coal company. The same men organized a little railroad company that could condemn land which probably the other railroad had gotten possession of to prevent their developing it; and by having the two corporations, one the main and the other the subsidiary corporation, they developed it. It is the same in the oil business. It is the same in the limestone business. It is the same in the coal business in other parts of the State.

I venture to say that nothing on this earth that we could do would get at the wrong end of the trust business more certainly than if we should strike out this provision. It is not intended for the trust. The trust is there, in control of its dominion. It already has its organization, and it does not care whether it controls it by means of a holding company or not; but it is a great thing for the little man, the little developer, the little man who hopes that at some time he will have a thing that can be put as a buttress against these great combinations of wealth, and who has just as much right to live as the big man.

Mr. President, this language provides in every possible way against the abuse of this privilege in the manner suggested by the Senators. It provides that this shall not be done where it substantially or materially lessens competition. That is all we can do. It provides that it may be done in the other case, where it is purely for investment. In my judgment, it would be a misfortune to strike it out. It would injure thousands upon thousands of little business men and would not hurt a single trust now organized in the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, an example which I remember in my own town I think will apply in this case.

The people of my town, a small town, wanted to build a street railroad. They did not have the money there with which to build it. They opened correspondence with street railroads throughout the country, and they found a street railroad company in Grand Rapids, Mich., 2,000 miles away, that had some money to invest, and they invested it in this little street railroad in my town.

Now, how does that hurt anybody? It helped to build up my town. It put the money in the town. It is not in competition with any other railroad. Why should they not do that? Why should we not say "This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment"?

They purchased some of the stock, and that railroad was built 2,000 miles away, and they hold the stock now. How does that hurt anybody? How does that hurt any citizen or destroy anybody? Why should not that be done?

The House left that provision in the bill, and I give this as an example of the way it would operate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what the capitalization of the local company is as compared with the amount of capital which the Grand Rapids concern has?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have never gone into that. I do not know what the capitalization is. That is a question for our State to look after, and the State ought to look after it.

Mr. THOMAS. Precisely. If that can be done under the laws of the State, of course we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. THOMAS. But the Senator inquired how a system of that kind would operate injuriously. I gave an illustration a few minutes ago of an actual situation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, that is a bad case. If we can not strike down one evil without at the same time destroying a thousand innocent people——

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator permit me to finish the answer to his question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. This concern controls the gas and electric company in my city. It is a very profitable company. It owns two or three other concerns that are operated at a loss. Now, it affects us just in this way: The price to the consumers of my city is kept beyond what it reasonably ought to be, when you consider the return, because of the fact that this operating company is losing in other places. In other words, the people of one community under such an arrangement are taxed to supply the losses and deficiencies of corporations in other communities that may be, as the Senator says, 2,000 miles away.

Mr. OVERMAN. That can not be so in the town where I live, where they built this little railroad, and other companies have built railroads in other towns.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not so always, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course not.

Mr. THOMAS. But the fact that it is frequently so makes it necessary to legislate against it.

Mr. OVERMAN. And in prosecuting one great trust you destroy 10,000 innocent people who are building up this country. Town after town all over the South is being built up by the capital of these northern corporations. That is injuring nobody, but is building up our own State. If you destroy that, we will have to live among ourselves and trade with nobody on the outside.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the time will come when the Senator and his people will pay, and pay dearly, for the aid which he now thinks is so necessary. It will come in the way of taxes, increased capitalization, and all of the other ways that the holding company knows so well how to manipulate and how to attain.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. We have a State legislature that will control them. We have a commission that fixes their prices. A corporation in Grand Rapids, Mich., can not injure our people by putting their money down there and building this little railroad. This is only one of a thousand instances where people have gone from the North and from the West and have invested their money in little corporations that are not in competition with any other corporation on earth; and what injury can it work to the people?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am always glad to yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks that no capital will come into his State to organize a corporation, where there is a good and honest field of investment, unless the stock of that corporation is owned by some outside corporation?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, an aggregation of capital helps to build up a country. Individuals will not subscribe. If we had looked to the individuals in the North to come down and build up this little railroad in our town, we could not have gotten a cent from them; but where they had an aggregation of capital they could afford to come down and take stock in this little company and build it up and give us a street railroad, and give us an electric-light company, and give us, if you please, a water-power company, provided it is not a monopoly, and provided it is not destroying competition.

That is the question: Is it destroying competition? If it is destroying competition, we have given a power by which an investigation can be made, and you can go into court and stop them and enjoin them and punish them. Is not that power enough, at this time when we are in the midst of war, without destroying the business of this country?

Pardon my exuberance.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. REED. I do not know what the question was. I was so completely engulfed in the tornado of passion——

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not mean to be passionate nor did I mean to be a tornado.

Mr. REED. I had forgotten that I was asking a question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was just a little bit emphatic; that is all.

Mr. REED. I say that there is not an honest field of human endeavor that capital will not enter without any such device as the tying together of a lot of different corporations. Whenever in the State which the Senator so ably represents there is a field of industrial activity that has not been entered money will come there, and it is not necessary to introduce in his State the tail of a trust, the head of which is in Michigan, in order to develop his State.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think this is a trust. I do not know that it is. I do not believe there is a trust in North Carolina. I never heard of one. We are progressing, however, and we are progressing very rapidly. Twenty-five years ago we were in poverty and distress. We had no money and we had to go North and secure money with which to build these great institutions of ours. As I said this morning, this development could not have been brought about if we had not been able to go and get machinery with which to equip our cotton mills, and make payment in stock. They would not give us any money, but they would supply us the machinery and take stock in payment. The consequence is that we have more cotton mills to-day than any other State in the Union, and there is no other State which is progressing so rapidly. There is not a trust there, and there is competition everywhere.

Mr. REED. But that is not this case. That is already provided for.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that is provided for, but some Senators would have stricken that out and stopped that sort of business.

Mr. REED. That is a case of organizing a corporation in Michigan, and then that corporation organizing a corporation in the Senator's State and in mine and in all the States of the Union. We propose to recognize by this bill and by express language the right to create that sort of thing and impose it upon this country.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think not.

Mr. REED. Now, you can organize a corporation in your State, and any individual can own stock in it, and individuals will come and acquire the stock if it is a good field of venture. It is not necessary to tie together a lot of corporations by the method that is here permitted, namely, to allow one corporation to organize another, and another to organize another, so as to have two or three hundred corporations organized and tied together.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator, with his great ability, always gives us very extreme cases—cases that I agree ought to be corrected and ought to be prosecuted. I am willing to put in the penitentiary the men who do those things; but what I said to the Senator is true—that in destroying one offending corporation you destroy a thousand or ten thousand that are perfectly innocent and are doing a lawful and legal and just business.

Mr. REED. No; you would not destroy them. You would simply say that no more of them should be created hereafter in this way.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why should not a corporation in North Carolina, if it has $100,000 surplus capital, go into Missouri and invest it in some little corporation engaged in some line of business down there?

Mr. REED. Because we want our corporations to be organized at home and run by human beings, as the law provides, and not run by another corporation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but your corporation would be run by human beings in Missouri. We would have to look to an honest Missourian to see that the business was transacted justly.

Mr. REED. No; you would simply have some putty men there, some dummies, and it would be run the other way.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not my experience. I have just referred to an example from Grand Rapids, Mich., which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] knows all about. They invested $200,000 down in my State. They have no Michigan men at all in the directorate. The corporation is entirely controlled by men in my town. The concern is paying. You could not have found a man in Grand Rapids who would have put $200,000 of his own money in it; but this company had some supplies to sell. We bought our supplies from them, and they took the stock and subscribed the money. What harm is there in that? It has helped to build up our State and helped to build up my town, and who has been injured by it?

Mr. REED. I will tell the Senator. I will answer him right now. He has already answered his own question. They did that plainly for the purpose of making a market for their wares and shutting other people out of that market.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have not done it.

Mr. REED. The Senator stated that the local company bought supplies from them.

Mr. OVERMAN. They buy supplies where they please.

Mr. REED. The Grand Rapids people sell their supplies to this company, do they not?

Mr. OVERMAN. Some supplies; yes. If they sell them as cheaply as anybody else, our people will buy from them.

Mr. REED. Why is it necessary to have a corporation do it?

I can give the Senator an illustration. The United Gas Improvement Co. by that means has gained control of nearly every gas plant in the United States. They organize a local company. The minority of the stock of the local company is sold to local people. The majority is held by them. They proceed, under that device, to milk that community; and the local stockholders, so far as I know, have never obtained a dividend. They have had local people as directors, but the directors have been the dummies of the Gas Trust. I am opposed to that sort of a proceeding.

Mr. OVERMAN. So am I; but I think a State ought to have power to deal with a situation of that kind. The States have some power. Let them control that sort of thing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether the Grand Rapids company to which he referred, which I presume is a holding company, owns the stock of other railroads operating in other cities or towns?

Mr. OVERMAN. In my State?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; through the South, or anywhere in the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know of any other company that they are operating. A bank cashier wanted to build a little street railroad in my town. He corresponded with a banker in Grand Rapids, Mich., and got into communication with a company that controlled a street railroad and had some money to invest. They invested it in a little street railroad in my town. It has hurt nobody, and both parties are satisfied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock has arrived. From this time forward debate will proceed 15 minutes to a Senator, not to exceed 20 minutes to the Senator offering the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that there are two kinds of holding companies—one is the holding company that is organized for monopoly, and the other is the holding company that is organized for investment and with a view to prosecuting in the various States enterprises under a common control, such as street railways, gas companies, and so forth. One reason for the holding company of subsidiaries is that it is oftentimes, and I think in most cases, almost impossible for a corporation organized in one State to own directly a public utility in another State, and hence they are obliged, if they wish to make the investment, to organize a holding company with a view to prosecuting their enterprises in numerous States. The inquiry of the Interstate Commerce Committee on this subject——

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am so limited in my time——

Mr. REED. I wish to ask merely one question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

Mr. REED. If the States have thrown that safeguard around them, could it be stricken down and nullified by this device?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it is stricken down or nullified. The State compels the capital invested in public utilities within its boundaries to be represented by shares of stock in local companies under the control either of the State or of the municipality acting under the State legislature. So this arrangement meets the purpose of the State. Instead of having a foreign corporation organized under the laws of another

State conducting its public utilities within the boundaries of that State, it insists upon corporations being organized for that purpose under the laws of the individual State.

A great deal of testimony was taken on this subject before the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I must say when the inquiry commenced I was disposed to regard all holding companies as practically of the same character, but we found upon inquiry that there were large investment organizations of this kind effected throughout the United States; that there were numerous investing companies which took the form of a holding company with a view to develop public utilities in the various States. We also found that their form of organization was very perfect; that they have skilled engineers, experts, and accountants, and a system of control which enables them not only to determine what the best economies are, but to enforce them. We found that in numerous States where railroad systems and public-utilities systems generally had broken down because of it they gladly welcomed the guidance of holding companies organized under the laws of another State to control the corporations within the individual State.

It is a well-known fact that the entire administration of these local utilities has been immensely improved by these operations.

It is true that that system can be abused like all other systems. A holding company may issue exaggerated issues of stocks and bonds upon the basis of the securities issued by the local companies, and I think no doubt that instances of that kind exist.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will yield in a moment to the Senator. But we found that that practice was diminishing in its abuse steadily and that the laws of the respective States were being so vigilantly controlled by the people themselves that it was impossible or difficult to continue these abuses.

Recollect that now there is a public-utility commission in almost every State in the Union. Most of these public-utility commissions are controlling the stock and bond issues of the local companies, the subsidiary companies owned by these great holding companies. The issues of the stocks and bonds in the local companies are not under the control of the foreign holding company, but actually under the control of the commission organized under the laws of the respective States, and the very purpose of compelling the organization of these corporations under the laws of the respective States is to insure control not only over capitalization but of every detail of the business, extending even to the regulation and fixing of the rates themselves. This business has now assumed enormous proportions. It is being conducted, and it can not be successfully conducted in the end, unless it can be conducted in the most scientific and businesslike way.

The various representatives of the investment companies appeared before us, and I am sure that so far as I was concerned they entirely disarmed my suspicions regarding this system. I believe it is a good system. I do not believe that it has any of the evils of the monopolistic tendencies of the ordinary holding company that is organized to suppress competition. Recollect these holding companies hold public utilities that are in competition with each other. We all know, the country is beginning to realize the fact, that every public utility is in one sense a monopoly, and the only thing to control in that competition is regulation by the State or the municipality.

Mr. President, we are now in the throes of warlike conditions throughout the world that are sufficiently disturbing the operations of capital. In my judgment it would be a fatal mistake to now check the operations of these great holding companies and declare them invalid and compel a division of their holdings and the administration of these various public utilities under individual control, inefficient control, in various towns and municipalities, and not under the scientific, businesslike control of these great holding organizations or investment companies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if we are going to stop enacting trust legislation on account of the war in Europe, let us stop. Let us not undertake to handle a subject and then every time there is a proposition made that will draw a single drop of blood from the veins of the monopolies of this country have the cry raised that there is a war in Europe and we ought not to do that particular thing. If it is wrong to legislate right on this question because there is a war in Europe, let us stop all legislation now and wait until matters settle themselves; but do not let us pretend that we are passing antitrust legislation, and every time it is proposed to do something that will count cry out, "There is a war in Europe."

Mr. President, I am astounded to hear my friend stand here and defend the system that he has been defending. If we have condemned any one thing in our platforms, it has been the holding companies, it has been the very device he has named, by which a few gentlemen get together some capital and organize a company, promote a corporation, and then organize another company and attach it to that corporation. The great Bell Telephone Co. was organized in that way, and they have a scientific management.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that in the discussion I drew the distinction between a class of holding companies and those engaged in suppressing competition and upholding monopoly. There is a class of holding companies entirely distinct from those, and it was in reference to those holding companies that I addressed myself.

Mr. REED. The Bell Telephone Co. was built on this plan. There was a parent company. The parent company then organized another company and took a majority of the stock in it. That company was in a territory within which it could organize subsidiaries, and it took a majority in those subsidiaries, until finally that parent company, with probably one-twentieth of the capital that was invested in all the companies, controlled this vast network of companies spread over the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Bell Co. has been prosecuted, and has been convicted, and an order made dissolving it.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that can be done in that case where it created a monopoly, could it not be done under the Sherman antitrust law with the monopoly the Senator speaks of? Why not let the Attorney General prosecute them instead of stopping any corporation from holding them?

Mr. REED. If that argument be sound, then we have no right to write a line to the Sherman Act. If it be sound with reference to the illustration I gave and sound with reference to this subject matter we are now considering, then it is equally sound as to every combination and every restraint of trade, and we need no more legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. As the Senator knows, the Bell Co. has been prosecuted and convicted.

Mr. REED. Exactly. I use this illustration to show that this company, which had gone to such extent that it could be prosecuted and convicted under the Sherman Act, is pursuing the very method that my friend here said is being so scientifically pursued throughout the country; and, indeed, it is being scientifically pursued.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator might add that if his amendment does not carry, under this provision it would be very doubtful whether the Attorney General can prosecute any more of them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator claim that an organization like the Bell Co. could not be prosecuted under the Sherman law, whatever we do with this act?

Mr. THOMAS. I pretend to say that if we are going to legitimatize these holding companies there will be an end to the further prosecution of them.

Mr. REED. If you had had this statute on the books, the Bell Telephone Co. would have come forward and said: "It is true we have a company here at Philadelphia, a parent company; it is true we have a company in Chicago; that we have a company in St. Louis; that we have another in Kansas City; that we have one in Raleigh. We have all these companies, but they were not in competition; these places were not in competition with each other; and we have simply bound them together by a stock ownership. We have a very scientific management; we have cut off a great many expenses; we have auditors and we have skilled men and all that," and make the further argument that has been made here. I tell you, if you write this into the law, in my humble judgment, the day will come when the people will rise in this country and cry anathema maranatha upon the legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator, as a lawyer, if he thinks that would have availed them in the Supreme Court in answer to the prosecution?

Mr. REED. I think it would have been very likely to have been a very great argument in their favor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand it would have been the only argument that would have availed them.

Mr. REED. I fear it would have been conclusive. "No corporation shall, directly or indirectly, acquire the stock of any other corporation," and so forth—

Provided, This section does not apply to corporations which form subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying out of their immediate lawful business.

The immediate lawful business of the Bell Telephone Co. was to put in telephones, but it kept it up to a point where the Supreme Court said it had created a monopoly. Of course, the long-distance business came in, to some extent, to tie the whole scheme together.

Mr. WALSH. The present administration instituted a proceeding against the Bell Telephone Co., my understanding about it is, not because it acquired new lines or the stock in companies operating lines in new territory, but because it acquired competing lines. Out in our part of the country, for instance, they acquired or sought to acquire the lines of the Intermountain State Telephone Co., the headquarters of which are in Denver.

Mr. REED. That would not reach the question of their control in every city of the country as an independent proposition.

Mr. WALSH. No; but so long as the Bell Telephone Co. contented itself with the acquisition of lines in new territory, or went into new territory, no complaint was made. However, just as soon as they began acquiring competing lines in their own territory or competing lines in new territory, to which they desired to go, they ran counter to the Sherman law.

Mr. REED. Nevertheless the Senator will agree with me that even aside from that they had already established substantially a complete monopoly in this country.

Mr. WALSH. I am unable to understand that, except that they had patents.

Mr. REED. All their patents expired 10 or 12 years ago that were of any real potential value.

Mr. WALSH. So far as they acquired the lines of any competing company in any of their territory, they would of course become subject to the provisions of the Sherman law, and that is sought to be prevented.

Mr. REED. The mere organization under one control of the local exchanges of all the important cities of the country made it impossible for any outside company to compete in long-distance or other business. Others simply could not get into the territory.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri moves to strike out this language on page 9 of the old print of the bill:

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce—

That, of course, means interstate or foreign commerce—

from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect—

The attention of the Senate is invited to this language, which has not been emphasized by anyone opposed to this provision—when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Showing that it harmonizes with the balance of the bill, and that any of these acts which eliminate or substantially lessen competition are denounced by the bill. A great deal has properly been said in commendation of the House Committee on the Judiciary with reference to the bill. I desire to read what it says, and it is very brief, with reference to these particular exceptions, one of which I have just read and which the Senator from Missouri proposes to strike out. This is from the report of the House Judiciary Committee:

Section 8 is intended to eliminate this evil so far as it is possible to do so, making such exceptions from the law as seem to be wise, which exceptions have been found necessary by business experience and conditions, and the exceptions herein made are those which are not deemed monopolistic and do not tend to restrain trade.

One of the exceptions referred to in this report is that now proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. President, in addition to that, the committee of the Senate has reported a provision which further protects the people. It is found on page 10, as follows:

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited and made illegal by the antitrust laws.

Therefore, so far as the interests of the people are concerned, they are fully protected by the bill, and especially by the proviso to which I have just this moment called attention.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this amendment will not, I think, have the effect apprehended by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. The clause immediately preceding the one proposed to be stricken out in the third paragraph of section 8 is in these words:

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

That would authorize the investment of the Grand Rapids company in the street railway company of Salisbury. The clause that is proposed to be striken out provides:

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

I intend to vote for the motion to strike this out, because I believe to leave it in the bill will legalize a mischievous practice. I need go no further than the greatest monopoly that has existed in the United States, the Standard Oil Co., which has a number of subsidiary corporations, all of the same name except the State where incorporated. Among them were the Standard Oil companies of Ohio, of Kentucky, and of two or three other States.

In Tennessee we have antitrust laws prohibiting combinations and conspiracies tending to lessen competition and destroy commerce. The Standard Oil Co. was doing business in that State under the name, as I now remember, of the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio. The attorney general of Tennessee filed a bill charging that company with violating the laws of the State and seeking to expel it from the State under the provision of our statute. The case was brought to trial, and a decree granted enjoining the company from doing business in Tennessee. Within 30 days after that decree was entered all the property of the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio in the State was turned over to the Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky, and the same business went on without any interruption. That is what can be done if this section is enacted into law. You can not fix the responsibility on the parent company. It can dodge and cover under first one and then another of its subsidiary companies, and it is impossible to reach it. Forbidding such corporations creates no hardship on anyone. There is no reason why the parent company can not do business in all the several States through agents. Corporations should not be allowed to escape responsibility, as they are now doing, under the cover of subsidiary corporations. The clause which the Senator from Missouri has moved to strike out permits and legalizes this scheme of monopolists, and it should not be enacted into law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Transferring my pair, as heretofore, to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. Announcing my pair and transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to say that the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST]. If the Senator from Kansas were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I am requested to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been called from the Chamber on account of the condition of his health. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] in consequence of sickness in his family. I also announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] and to state that he is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Ashurst	Jones	Pomerene	Sterling
Brady	Lane	Reed	Thomas
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Thompson
Chamberlain	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Townsend
Clapp	Norris	Shields
Cummins	Poindexter	Shively

NAYS—31.

Bankhead	Hollis	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Burton	Hughes	Oliver	Smoot
Chilton	Lewis	Overman	Swanson
Culberson	McCumber	Perkins	Thornton
Dillingham	McLean	Pittman	Walsh
Fall	Martin, Va.	Ransdell	White

Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Saulsbury	Weeks
Colt	La Follette	Sherman	West
Crawford	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Ariz.	Works
du Pont	Lippitt	Smith, Ga.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. In section 8, page 9, line 8, before the word "lessening," the word "substantial" should be stricken out to make the language accord with what precedes it, following the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 9, line 8, before the word "lessening," it is proposed to strike out "substantial."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. In the same section and on the same page, in lines 15 and 16, the words "eliminate or substantially" should go out for the same reason, and I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 9, line 15, after the word "to," it is proposed to strike out "eliminate or substantially."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Also, in the same section, page 10 of the old print, line 7, before the word "competition," I move to strike out the word "substantial."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. In line 14, on the same page, before the word "competition," I move to strike out the word "substantial."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendments just made on my motion are to perfect the text.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for section 8 the amendment which I have sent to the desk. I will ask that the amendment be stated.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa pardon me for a moment? I have a further amendment to offer to section 8.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator, but I do not care to have it count in my 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has not yet commenced.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and of the committee particularly, to the language of the Senate amendment on page 11, as it has been amended. It reads:

That nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws.

Mr. CULBERSON. On what page?

Mr. WALSH. It is now the last paragraph of the section. By this section we have again declared to be illegal the creation of a monopoly in either one of two ways, so that, of course, this act is not to be construed as authorizing that; but it is not clearly provided that notwithstanding we have declared those things to be illegal, prosecutions of them may still be carried on under the operation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. In other words, I suggest to the committee that the language here does not reach as far as they intended it should reach. It simply declares that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to make legal that which the antitrust act declares to be illegal; but it does not declare that prosecutions under the antitrust act may still be continued or instituted, notwithstanding anything herein contained. In other words, it does not clearly negative the idea that we have not made a substitute for the present method of the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the suggestion of the Senator?

Mr. WALSH. The suggestion is that we should add the following language:

Nor to exempt any person from the penal provisions thereof.

I offer that amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the paragraph, on page 10, after the word "laws," in line 21, the following:

Nor to exempt any person from the penal provisions thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment which the Senator from Montana proposes to amend was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 8 as amended it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of two or more corporations engaged in commerce and carrying on business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prevent corporations not engaged in commerce acquiring, owning, and holding capital stock or other share capital solely for investment and not using the same in bringing about, or attempting to bring about, a common control of the corporations whose stock or other share capital it owns and holds.

It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of any other corporation also engaged in commerce and carrying on a business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect, nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this section has been debated so fully that I intend to content myself with a mere statement of the difference between the substitute I now offer and the substitute offered by the Senator from Washington, voted upon a few moments ago, and the difference between my substitute and the section as it has been amended.

First, with regard to the difference between my proposal and that of the Senator from Washington: So far as ordinary corporations are concerned, the difference consists in the provision that a corporation not engaged in interstate commerce may be permitted to hold the stock of two or more corporations which are engaged in commerce if the stock is not acquired or held to bring about or to attempt to bring about a common control of the competitive corporations. I regard that as essential in a regulation of this character. I have very grave doubt whether we have the constitutional power to prohibit a corporation that is not engaged in interstate commerce from acquiring or holding the stock of corporations that are engaged in interstate commerce if the acquisition or holding does not affect interstate commerce. I doubt whether we can assume that the holding of a limited amount of stock in such corporations has such an effect upon the trade of the country as to bring it within our regulatory powers. Moreover, I believe it is wise to permit these corporations, such as insurance companies and savings banks, to hold such stock if it is held solely for investment. To prohibit it would disturb the business of this country so radically, it would destroy so many relations that are now established, that I can not think Congress desires to do it if to do it will accomplish nothing in the way of preserving competition or of promoting the general welfare.

The second difference between the substitute I have offered and that of the Senator from Washington lies in the fact that I have excepted banks and common carriers from the operation of the section. With regard to banks, I have done it because I think our regulation respecting banks ought to be found in the laws relating to our currency and the organization of those institutions, rather than in a statute of this sort; and, furthermore, we have just enacted a statute which not only authorized but commanded the banks of this country to take stock and own it and hold it in the Federal reserve institution. It may be said that they are not competitive, but I think they are competitive. I think it will be found that they are in a proper sense competitive. At least, we ought not to attempt to interfere with the thing we have so recently done. Whether it was wisely done or not is not material at this time.

I have excepted common carriers because, in my opinion, an entirely different section ought to be adopted to regulate common carriers as to stock ownership. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that a common control of two competitive railway corporations is contrary to the antitrust law. If there is any one thing that is now thoroughly established beyond any controversy, it is that two competitive railway corporations or common-carrier corporations can not be united in a single control, and I hesitate very much to attempt to better the antitrust act. It is ample, it is efficient, and I can not think we will render the country a service by intruding upon that field in this legislation.

Moreover, there are a good many States in the Union which forbid a company organized in one State from owning the physical property of a common carrier in another State. If the ownership of the stock in a common carrier is an extension of the line or is an ownership that does not violate the antitrust statute, I do not know any way in which continuous lines can be secured or in which systems can be organized without permitting a railway company organized in one State to own the stock of a railway company organized in another State. It must, however, be subordinate all the while to the antitrust law. It must not be a consolidation or concentration of two competitive lines. I think we shall do better if we propose a section upon this subject when we advance to the consideration of the railway securities bill, an amendment of the interstate law, a section in which we can give to the Interstate Commerce Commission, without complication and without inference, the jurisdiction which we think that commission ought to have with regard to such a subject.

So much for the comparison with the substitute offered by the Senator from Washington. I now compare it with the bill as it is.

I have already expressed my view of the bill as it is, so far as it relates to one corporation holding the stock of another. I have the gravest doubt whether the section as it has now been agreed upon is helpful. I have the most serious misgivings with regard to it. I fear it will weaken rather than strengthen the regulations of commerce with regard to such subjects.

My substitute differs from the committee bill, first, in that it applies to existing holdings of capital stock. If we attempt simply to regulate the future—that is to say, if we attempt to prohibit one corporation from acquiring the stock of another, although they be competitors—we will have established, as far as we can, the relations which have been vexing the people of this country for now more than a decade. There is no reason why an ordinary corporation, exercising no public franchise, should not dispose of the stock it holds in violation of the wise and salutary principle that one corporation should not hold the stock of its competitor.

I should hesitate to advance that proposition if the penalty of violation were imprisonment, because there is vast difficulty in determining whether one corporation is or ought to be a competitor of another. That is not an easy subject, and I should not favor it at all with regard to past relations, for it would be unconstitutional, in the first place, and it would create great hardship in the second place; but as long as the section is to be administered by the trade commission, and the trade commission can say to an offending corporation, "You must dispose of the stock you hold in a rival company within a given time, to be fixed by the commission," no possible hardship will be imposed upon these ordinary trading corporations.

The second difference between my substitute and the committee bill relates to the holding company pure and simple. I omit in my amendment the paragraph which the Senate has just refused to strike out of the committee bill upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri. I feel that every Senator here will live to regret the incorporation of that paragraph in any regulation of commerce.

There are many objections to holding companies, but the chief one has not yet been suggested. The chief one is that it permits a small amount of capital to control a very large business. Ten per cent, 15 per cent, of the capital of a corporation in a single hand, if the stock be widely distributed, will control it; and if that corporation be permitted to buy another with equal capital it will control the additional capital, and so on and on, until you have put in a single hand with a trifling amount of capital, as compared with all that is involved, the power to control the whole business, and that is what is going on in this country every day. We all know it. It has been testified here over and over again that 10 per cent of the capital of a great corporation will control its management and its policy.

Moreover, if the paragraph in the House bill provided that all the stock of the subsidiary corporation should be owned by the parent company or the principal company, there would be less objection to it. I would have no serious doubt about the ownership of all the stock, for then the evil I have just suggested would not exist; but here we have not limited it. We have allowed the holding company to acquire just enough of the stock of the subsidiary company to control it and then proceed indefinitely with that expansion of capital and that limitation of power.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] pointed out the other day, and he stated a truth of which we are all conscious, that this pyramiding of capital can be finally projected to such lengths that a very few dollars will control a million dollars and more in the ultimate operation of the business of these allied companies.

I hope, having considered the whole subject, that we will not be content with the inadequate provision in the Senate bill.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose I have about consumed my time, have I not?

Mr. CHILTON. I just wanted to ask the Senator why he put in the second proviso, not allowing a record of a conviction under his section to be evidence in any prosecution under the Sherman law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do that because I have insisted from the very beginning that this legislation is supplemental to the antitrust law; that it must not be permitted to impair its efficiency or interfere with its processes. This section is to be worked out through the administration of the trade commission, and I do not want any order of the commission, or any order of the court following the order of the commission, to interfere in any way with the enforcement of the antitrust law. Therefore I have added that provision to my amendment.

I can say no more, Mr. President. The whole subject has been exploited. I think we all understand it fully. I offer my substitute as one which is fair to the corporation but necessary for the protection of the public, and upon it I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator if he is not willing to divide his amendment so that its provisions can be voted upon separately? I am in favor of it all except the last clause—that relating to the enforcement of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to do that. I know there are Senators here who do not feel that it is necessary and might be embarrassing at some time. Therefore with the permission of the Senate I submit it without the last proviso, asking that that be voted upon immediately after the first division, if the first division is adopted. If it is not adopted, then it will not be necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Iowa has concluded to divide the questions in his amendment, because there is a part of his amendment that I am very much in favor of and a part of it that I am constrained to vote against. Before voting against any portion of his proposition, I feel like saying a few words in explanation of my vote, because of the great standing and reputation of the Senator from Iowa in his opposition to oppressive monopoly. I am opposed to making an exception of railroad companies.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not make an exception of railway companies, because I expect to have them dealt with in the other bill that is before the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The other bill is not before the Senate for consideration now, and this bill deals with railroad companies. The Senator's amendment, if adopted, would lay down a preventive rule of corporate stock ownership as to corporations generally and give an implied permit, so far as this statute is concerned, to railroad companies to continue their practice of merger by corporate stock ownership. That has been denounced by the courts of our country from the trial court to the Supreme Court of the United States. I could not vote in favor of that exception at any time or in any bill upon which I am called to vote.

I am also opposed, Mr. President, to weakening the prohibition of corporate stock ownership of competing companies by making an exception of so-called investment companies. The Senator mentions insurance companies and he mentions savings banks. Among the abuses of monopoly in recent years have been the control of banks and the control of insurance companies as investing agencies by those persons who were forming a monopoly. It is only a short time since the financial agencies of Mr. Harriman and his associates wrecked the Chicago & Alton Railroad and put upon the market sixty-odd million dollars of watered stock, using the power which they exercised over at least one of the great insurance companies of New York to take the money which the people had paid in hard-earned premiums for their insurance policies, and which had been accumulated by this insurance company, and put that into their pockets in exchange for this watered stock. There is an ample field of investment for all legitimate investment companies without excepting them from the prohibition of owning the stock of competing companies.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, the substitute offered by the Senator from Washington would have permitted exactly the same thing.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is mistaken in regard to that. There was no exception in that respect in the substitute I offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. There was an exception that the companies must be competing. The insurance company to which the Senator referred could have bought that stock. I do not think really it did, but it could have bought that stock just the same.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It could have bought the stock in one company, but not in two competing companies.

Mr. CUMMINS. It did not buy the stock.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; it did.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It bought the stock of other companies and was the owner of stock in the general Harriman system; but whether it did or not, it could do it, and the same control which induced it to buy the watered stock of the Chicago & Alton controlled it to invest in the watered stock of the Illinois Central or any other competing line.

The Senator says one reason for the exemption of railroads from the effect of this section of the act is the fear that it would weaken the antitrust law already established for the regulation of railroad monopoly or the prevention of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; the Senator misunderstood me. We feared that the section, taken as a whole as it came from the committee, might weaken the antitrust law. What I said about railroads is that the Supreme Court had declared positively that the control of one railroad by its competitor was illegal under the antitrust law and would not be permitted, and that we added nothing to the strength of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator will find, if he reads his remarks, that he urged that we not only do not add anything to the strength of it, but we might weaken the law as already established by the decision of the court under the Sherman law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not so intend, if I expressed myself unhappily in that way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We will assume that the Senator did not say that. He now says that we add nothing to the strength of it. The antitrust law that he refers to was not established only as to railroads. It was established as to the restraint of trade in a corporation. If there is any force in the Senator's argument, we ought not to interfere with it as to railroads, it applies with the same force to the entire section, as to the regulation of investments by any corporation or any corporate ownership of stock. If we are to restrain them as to some without weakening or repealing the present antitrust law as construed by the courts, we can do it also as to railroads.

The first part of the Senator's amendment, in my judgment, is a very meritorious proposition; but the two provisos which he attaches to it, excepting entirely railroad companies and investing companies from the effect of its prohibition, go so much further than any exception in the bill as reported by the committee that, unless we can vote separately upon them, I will be compelled to vote against the entire amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask which proviso the Senator from Missouri asked should be separated from the remainder?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The last proviso, beginning in line 9.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator if he will not except both provisos. He can offer them separately afterwards.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will ask for a separate vote on the amendment, without either proviso.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, is that proper under the rule? The Senator can modify his amendment. Does he modify his amendment by striking out the two provisos?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a difference of opinion. What I want is a free, full vote, and I offer the amendment, first, to close with the word "character," in line 10, page 2.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the vote begins, I wish to make simply an inquiry. Does the Senator mean to have the section prohibit stock ownership and have it immediately apply to present conditions?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do; but possibly the Senator from Missouri has not in mind what I have with regard to its enforcement. There is no penal provision attached to this section. It is to be enforced by the trade commission upon a complaint that anyone is violating the section. The trade commission investigates, and if it finds there is a violation it orders that the violation shall cease and that the person or corporation complained of shall bring itself in harmony with the law. That gives the corporation which now holds stock which it ought not to hold under this principle an opportunity to dispose of the stock.

Mr. REED. Of course that will give some relief, but it strikes me that there ought to be a period allowed for readjustment. I do not know how anyone can feel more strongly than I do against these practices; but if a condition now exists, of course it can not be stopped to-day, nor in a week could it be readjusted. It would seem to me that the Senator ought to put into his amendment a period as to present conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have thought the period I suggested sufficient. But that is purely a matter of detail, and if the Senator from Missouri will offer an amendment to my amendment of that kind I shall have no objection to it, provided the period be reasonable.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand the Senator from Iowa to modify his amendment by offering it as it appears on page 1 and page 2 of the amendment down to line 10, including the word "character."

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the present offer. I will say that I intend afterwards to offer it including all.

Mr. CULBERSON. But it is offered for the present as I have stated?

Mr. CUMMINS. For the present the substitute ends with the word "character," in line 7.

Mr. CULBERSON. In line 10 of this print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. BRISTOW's name was called). The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is necessarily absent on account of illness. He has a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST]. If the Senator from Kansas were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and the transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], with whom I have a general pair, being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Reannouncing my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and its transfer to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP. The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. If the junior Senator from North Dakota were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. REED. I make the same announcement in reference to the enforced absence of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. I will let the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and voted "nay."

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] having returned to the Chamber and cast his vote, I withdraw my vote and allow my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—16.

Chamberlain	Kenyon	Norris	Shafroth
Clapp	Lane	Perkins	Smoot
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Poindexter	Sterling

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Missouri pardon me just a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire now to offer my amendment as it is printed as a whole, because it expresses my real view; but I shall not ask for a roll call upon it, as it is evident that it would be useless.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Insert as a substitute for section 8 the following:

"SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful for any corporation to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of two or more corporations engaged in commerce, and carrying on business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prevent corporations not engaged in commerce acquiring, owning, and holding capital stock or other share capital solely for investment and not using the same in bringing about, or attempting to bring about, a common control of the corporations whose stock or other share capital it owns and holds.

"It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of any other corporation also engaged in commerce and carrying on a business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect, nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies.'"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which is printed on page 39 of the print of amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That the attorney general of any State may, at the cost of the State, bring suit in the name of the United States to enforce any of the antitrust laws.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. As a layman I want to ask the Senator from Missouri if this is not an entire innovation? Have we legislated along this line in reference to any other matter?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think that this is an innovation, and I am very desirous of an innovation in the matter of the enforcement of the antitrust act. I had a document the other day which was sent here from the Attorney General's office, the general import of which was that there has not been a very vigorous enforcement of the antitrust law for a good many years. I can see no legitimate objection to permitting the attorneys general of the various States, at the expense of the respective States, to bring suits in the name of the Federal Government to enforce this law. Under this bill as it is now framed there are broad rights given for securing witnesses and for obtaining evidence. I think there may be many cases where the attorney general of a State would bring a suit and avail himself of these rights.

Moreover, I believe it to be a wholesome thing that, instead of the enforcement of this great law being reposed simply in one overworked office, the attorneys general of the various States might utilize the law. I believe we would have a better enforcement of the law. The sooner this law is enforced the better it will be for the people and the better it will be for business, because the longer business institutions and business men continue to form combinations the more complicated the situation will become and the worse it will be for them in the end. The day of reckoning may be put off, but that a day of reckoning is coming is, to my mind, as certain as fate itself.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, any question which I propound will be solely for information. I will ask the Senator from Missouri, if this amendment is agreed to, if the result will be that the attorneys general of the various States, if they bring suit in the name of the United States, will prosecute such suits without any reference to or aid from the Department of Justice? Will it be purely a State prosecution?

Mr. REED. It would be, unless some Senator sees fit to offer an amendment providing otherwise. I understood the Senator from West Virginia had an amendment which he desired to offer to this amendment, and if he desires to do so I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, referring to what he has said as to the cost to the State, what cost would the State be expected to bear under his amendment? Would that mean the cost of witnesses and all that sort of thing?

Mr. REED. It means whatever cost would otherwise fall upon the National Government, if the Government brought the suit direct, would in this case fall upon the State, the attorney general of the State taking the responsibility.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that it is very important that such an amendment as this should be adopted. Minnesota had an experience in the Northern Securities case. The State brought suit under the antitrust law, but it was ruled out by the Supreme Court, and we secured no relief until the Attorney General of the United States directed the United States attorney for the district of Minnesota to move in the case. If Senators will look up the decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota case, they will find that that case was ruled out of court; but if the attorney general of the State had not moved in the case, we should not have secured any relief at all.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Minnesota if the ruling of the court was not based upon the antitrust law of 1890?

Mr. NELSON. The suit was based on the antitrust law of the United States, and also on the antitrust laws of the State of Minnesota—on both laws.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have this suggestion to make: I recognize the virtue that might flow from such a provision as the Senator from Missouri seeks to incorporate in the bill; I also recognize the remedy and the advantage that sometimes would follow from it; but I have this fear regarding it: We can not keep partisan political government out of this Nation; it is based upon that theory. You will have a Republican Attorney General of the United States with Democratic State attorneys general; you will have a Republican Attorney General instituting litigation not in harmony with the Democratic State attorneys general, and perhaps founded on political considerations. You will have a conflict ceaselessly going on, the public being ground between the upper and the nether millstones. With a Democratic Attorney General and Republican attorneys general of the States, you will have the condition reversed, but with the very same conflict and confusion. It appears to me, therefore, that unless you can adjust this whole system in such manner that it shall be under the supervision of the Attorney General of the United States, of whatever party, you would have no system, no harmony; you would merely have conflict and no results finally.

Furthermore, it is not within the power of the Federal Congress to authorize suits to be brought by attorneys general of the States and charge the expenses to the States. The Federal Congress, as I see it, can not proceed to create a burden upon a State, and put an obligation upon a State as a State which it has not itself assumed in the exercise of its duties and make it bear expenses and obligations which it has neither incurred by the direction of its voters nor by the volition of its legislature. Therefore, any suit brought, as I conceive it, by the attorney general of any State in the name of the Federal Government must be for the uses of the Federal Government; and therefore the expenses and burden must be borne by the Federal Government. If a suit is brought by a State as a State, then it should be separate from any connection with the Federal Government and should be conducted wholly for and in behalf of the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am asking the question for information as a layman. I want to ask the Senator from Illinois, whose grasp of the situation appeals to me, if the States are in their individual capacities to prosecute suits under the antitrust laws, if there is not great danger of having a diversity of conclusions? The State of New Hampshire, we will say, prosecutes under a certain provision of the antitrust law and fails to convict; the State of Illinois prosecutes and secures a favorable decision. Would not that be a very confusing situation, so far as the enforcement of the antitrust law is concerned? Of course, if it is left to the Department of Justice or to the General Government, there is but one conclusion to be reached, either favorable or unfavorable, and there is no diversity of finding. That appeals to me as a possibility that we ought not to overlook.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am very much impressed with the possibility of just such confusion, and I fear that if we adopt the amendment, instead of producing results desired we would have constant conflicts and interlocking difficulties and that there would be almost a paralysis in the procedure.

I, however, feel that a provision which authorizes the attorney general of a State to bring suit, with the consent of the Attorney General of the United States, or in the name of himself and the Attorney General, might be acceptable; but I can not see that it would be prudent. Indeed, I think I see much conflict and much confusion, and, indeed, much disaster in the results if the attorney general of each State is allowed to institute proceedings under this law, without any regard to what the Attorney General, carrying out the policy of the national legislation, may have to say upon the subject. For that reason I am inclined against the amendment, out of my fears as I have expressed them.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I do not think it would be wise to adopt this amendment. The States have different policies; they are interested in different ways. One State might be interested in perpetuating certain conditions. I myself would be a little afraid of New Jersey, the reputed mother of trusts, to say nothing of all the other States. In order to prevent the Federal Government from accomplishing anything, and to tie the Attorney General's hands, a proceeding might be instituted in New Jersey or some other State, and the court having acquired jurisdiction, and the Attorney General of the United States undertook to proceed elsewhere, the pendency of the first suit might be pleaded in abatement to second action. The first suit then pending might continue to pend, and it might never end. The persons in control might not want it to end. Therefore I do not think it at all wise to adopt this amendment. I readily concur in the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois along this same line that its adoption would create confusion.

There is another consideration, Mr. President. It would remove the responsibility for the enforcement of Federal laws from the Attorney General and the district attorneys, where that responsibility properly belongs. That ought not to be permitted. Conditions should not be created which would permit them to escape the responsibility placed on them for enforcing Federal statutes.

In addition to that, Mr. President, this is an innovation. This Government has now been in existence for more than a hundred years, and we have never yet seen proper to turn over the enforcement of Federal statutes to the States or to attorneys general of the States, nor have the States seen proper to turn over to the Federal Government the enforcement of State statutes. I believe in keeping the States and the Federal Union separate and distinct. Let each one operate in its own sphere uninterrupted and uninfluenced by any action of the other.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, answering the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I do not see how, in the last analysis, there would be any more diversity of result than under the present system. The suits contemplated, of course, would have to be brought in the Federal court; but in the end the decision of the Supreme Court, the views of the Supreme Court, the policy worked out by the Supreme Court, would prevail. So we would have in the end a uniformity of decision and opinion.

Answering one objection of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], this amendment does not seek to impose upon any State a burden. Of course, Congress could not do that. The most that this amendment does is to grant a privilege to the States. If the attorney general of a State, acting in connection with and on behalf of the people of his State, sees fit to bring a suit, it is brought at the expense of the State. The Senator is quite right, of course, in saying that Congress can not impose that duty or that burden on a State; but all that Congress does under the amendment is to permit the State the opportunity.

Mr. President, I am not in sympathy with the argument that a man who is the Attorney General of the United States and a man who is attorney general of a State can not be trusted to work together because one belongs to one political party and the other belongs to another political party. The attorney general of the State has the same purpose, the same incentive, the same duty as the Attorney General of the United States, even though he may not belong to the same political party to which the Attorney General of the United States belongs. It has, it seems to me, come to a pass when we may well ask ourselves, Are we not carrying the fetish of party too far to say that it is not safe to intrust two men with the discharge of a coordinate duty because one calls himself by one political name and the other calls himself by another political name?

Nor do I fear that the Attorney General of the United States would lose anything. He is the one who is naturally in possession of all the facts, being at the head of the legal department of the Federal Government; and if he wants to act, he would undoubtedly have abundant time in which to act; but, Mr. President, we have been confronted with one case where both officers were of the same political party, and yet had it not been for the activity of the attorney general of the State it is doubtful whether any proceeding would have been brought at all. It was the activity of the attorney general of the State, living in close contact with the people, and knowing from his everyday experience of the conditions of the State that led him to make the first move in that proceeding. The attorney general of a State, being among the people who directly and primarily suffer at the hands of the violators of the antitrust law, it seems to me, can well be given the authority to bring a suit; and he would, of course, bring it, as a rule, only when the Attorney General of the United States had failed or neglected to do so.

There is one suggestion made, and that is, that it is an innovation. It is an innovation, and I hope there will be more innovations. I hope more and more the people of this country in their localities can have access to the instrumentalities of our Government by which the law can be enforced in their midst, without having to await the action or depend upon the decision of an Attorney General in the city of Washington.

That is not said as any reflection whatever upon any Attorney General. It is based upon the broad proposition that the nearer you can bring government to the people in whose interest government is to be administered, the more surely government is bound to reflect the will, the purpose, and the interest of the people.

I hail this as an innovation. I hope the motion will prevail, and I hope it will be the forerunner of other innovations making the Government and its great instrumentalities and its great powers more and more responsive to and reflective of the will, the purpose, and the interest of the people throughout the various sections of this Union.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there is not the novelty or innovation in this matter that Senators suppose. The contractors on public buildings and those who make river and harbor improvements are required to give bond as security for the faithful performance of their contracts and for the payment of the bills of all subcontractors and material men. If they fail in that respect, under the law the people who suffer from such failure, whether they are subcontractors or material men, may bring suit on the bond in the name of the United States. If cases of that kind can be brought in mere matters relating to material and the wages of laboring men, why should we not allow the same privilege in a case of this kind, which concerns the welfare of all the people of the United States?

Away back in the early nineties the State of Minnesota brought suit in its own name to enforce not only its own antitrust law but also the Federal antitrust law. In that case, when it reached the Supreme Court, the court took the view not only that the suit could be brought only in the name of the United States, which was perhaps correct, but that it could be brought only at the instance of the Attorney General of the United States. In other words, under the law as it has been construed by the Supreme Court, a United States district attorney can move in the matter only when he acts under the direction and at the instance of the Attorney General of the United States.

In the Minnesota case we started this suit, and the Supreme Court turned us down; and it was only because the governor of the State of Minnesota and the governors of other States similarly interested came down here and saw the President, and as a result of their special efforts with the President of the United States—Mr. Roosevelt at that time—that they got the Attorney General to bring the suit which was finally decided in the Supreme Court of the United States in favor of the Federal Government.

Now, it may happen that we shall have a President or an Attorney General who is loath to prosecute in these cases. In that event, the parties affected—the people of the State—will be utterly helpless. We were fortunate in this case that President Roosevelt, after an interview with our governor and the governors of several other Northwestern States, did order the Attorney General of the United States to institute the suit. While it was done at the instance and in the name of the Attorney General of the United States and the district attorney of Minnesota, yet in that case it was President Roosevelt who really directed it. We may not always in the future have a President as willing as President Roosevelt was in that case to institute action. For that reason, if this law is a good law, if we believe in the efficacy of the antitrust law, if we believe in its continued enforcement, let us leave it so that the States can enforce it in the name of the United States if the Federal Government fails to move.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is a peril in this amendment that ought not to be overlooked. There are 48 different attorneys general in the United States. Among them, I have no doubt, there are many very excellent, very capable, and very efficient men; others, I dare say, who are entirely indifferent; and still others who are quite unequal to the task of conducting a vigorous prosecution against a great combination alleged to exist in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Yet any one of these 48 attorneys general may start in at any time, illy equipped as he may be, and begin an action by the United States against some great, powerful trust, anticipating the action which eventually would be taken by the Attorney General of the United States, with the corps of able assistants with which he is provided, and the attorney general of the State may do the very best he is able to do, and yet he is laboring under a decided disadvantage. Moreover, Mr. President, leaving out of consideration the want of qualifications from which he may suffer, he is handicapped in the matter of accumulating the evidence that is necessary in order to obtain a successful result in one of these prosecutions under all ordinary circumstances.

Everybody recognizes that every one of these actions is a great, tremendous task; that the evidence ordinarily adduced is voluminous in character. It is accumulated from witnesses from all parts of the country. The attorney general of a State is not equipped to get that evidence. Why, we have a bureau of the Government here, the Bureau of Corporations, charged with the express duty of gathering up the evidence in these cases to put in the hands of the Attorney General in order that there may be a vigorous prosecution; and in the preparation of one of these cases the whole power of the great Government of the United States is pitted against the almost equal power of the defendant that is called to bar. The attorney general in a small State, with the equipment at his command and with the resources that he is able to control in order to try a case of this kind, is at a pitiable disadvantage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH. Just as soon as I complete the idea, if the Senator pleases. Yet, Mr. President, one so illy equipped may go in and start a suit in the name of the United States, and being defeated in the action the judgment becomes absolutely conclusive. The hands of the Attorney General are thereafter tied, and he will be unable to utilize the forces of his office to bring again the same suit.

For instance, a criminal prosecution is instituted. The defendant is charged at the suit of the Government of the United States. I very seriously question whether the attorneys general of the States would be able to handle the machinery so as to prosecute under the criminal provisions of the act; but if they should prosecute civilly, the judgment even then would have the conclusive force of an estoppel against further prosecutions embodying the same facts.

I gladly yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the most potential enforcement we have had of the antitrust law, the most successful result, has been by the attorneys general of States?

Mr. WALSH. I should hardly like to admit that. Of course, we all know that some very vigorous prosecutions and some very successful prosecutions have been carried on by the eminently able attorneys general of the State represented by the Senator who has just spoken—Attorney General Hadley and Attorney General Crow of his State. The Senator's State has had men of high character and excellent attainments; but you must bear in mind that we are not legislating for conditions such as obtain in the State of Missouri, but for the conditions which obtain all over the Union.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the great State of Texas, where they have driven out monopoly after monopoly.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; the Senator has called my attention to two; but the force of my argument is not in the least disturbed—that there are many States in which they have excellent attorneys general, but others in which we must admit that they are not equal to the task.

Then, Mr. President, in view of that situation of affairs, is it at all strained to conceive that some one of these great corporations would in some way or other move a prosecution against itself in some particular State where it would be at a very decided advantage, and there secure a judgment of which it might avail itself in a subsequent prosecution that might be brought against it by the Attorney General of the United States?

I believe we can scarcely afford to take the chances involved in the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Missouri ought to change the amendment to meet the objections which were raised by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], which certainly are of great force.

I want to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he provide that the action can not be brought if an action is pending by the Government growing out of the same facts and circumstances, and provide further that the attorney general of the State can not bring the action until he has requested the Attorney General of the United States himself to proceed.

While I have not worded this very carefully, I will offer it as an amendment to the Senator's amendment:

Provided, That suit is not at the same time pending at the instigation of the Government growing out of the same facts: And provided further, That the attorney general of the State has, 60 days before commencing suit, requested the Attorney General of the United States to bring suit.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I see no objection to that amendment. Answering the Senator from Iowa in his time, not mine——

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that that is as aptly worded as it might be. I have just drawn it here at the desk, but I think it covers the point.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator that the only thing I seek to accomplish is to give to the various States the benefits of this legislation and to devise a plan by which the attorneys general of the States can avail themselves of it.

As the Senator says his amendment is not in exact form, I suggest that it is within five minutes of recess time. I think this is an important matter, and I should think it might go over until morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator that I have not the floor, although I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to suggest to both the Senators that I do not think the first proposition of the Senator from Iowa is at all necessary, as the officer of the State must bring the action in the name of the United States, and two actions between the same parties for the same thing could not be pending in the same court at the same time.

Mr. KENYON. They could be brought, however.

Mr. McCUMBER. Even if they were brought, the court would be compelled to dismiss the one or the other.

Mr. KENYON. That might be true.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the one which first acquired jurisdiction would go on.

Mr. KENYON. But it would result in endless confusion to have suit brought both by the State and by the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the latter proposition is very timely, and ought to be placed in the bill as an amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 1657. An act providing for second homestead and desert-land entries; and

H. R. 7967. An act to amend an act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Blythe, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide assistance to the cotton growers of Palo Verde Valley, Cal., in the harvesting of their cotton, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SWANSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Omega, Chatham, Dryfork, Victoria, Lone Oak, and Runnymede, all in the State of Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for personal rural credit, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against an increase in the tax on cigars, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to allow railroads to be placed near the Sibley Hospital, Washington, D. C., which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a memorial of Cigarmakers' Local Union, No. 54, of Evansville, Ind., remonstrating against the proposed increase in the revenue tax on cigars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Cigarmakers' International Local Union, No. 54, of Evansville, Ind., favoring the taking over by the Government as an emergency measure the packing plants, cold-storage warehouses, granaries, flour mills, and such other plants and industries as may be necessary to safeguard the food supply of the people of this country during the war in Europe, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

RAILWAY MAIL PAY.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference. The bill has been prepared by a joint committee of the two Houses to investigate the question of railway mail pay. I desire to introduce it and to have it referred to the committee.

The bill (S. 6405) authorizing and directing the Postmaster General to readjust the compensation of steam railroad companies for the transportation of mail was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I also present the report of the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter and Compensation for Transportation of Mails, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TITLE TO HOMESTEAD ENTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

DAVID TAYLOR.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) to correct error in H. R. 12045 was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the joint resolution is merely to correct a typographical error in a pension bill which has been passed by both Houses, and I should like to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request for the present consideration of the joint resolution without its being referred to the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rules, being a joint resolution, it will have to go to the committee. The committee can report it out promptly, I have no doubt.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have it acted upon promptly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHIVELY subsequently said: From the Committee on Pensions I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) to correct error in House bill 12045.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read as follows:

Whereas by error in printing H. R. 12045, reported by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, act approved July 1, 1914 (Private, No. 50), makes the designation of the military service of one David Taylor, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, to read "Company B, Fourteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry": Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in H. R. 12045, approved July 1, 1914 (Private, No. 50), granting an increase of pension to one David Taylor, be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of David Taylor, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, which were, on page 1, to strike out lines 3, 4, and 5, and lines 1 to 7, inclusive, on page 2, and insert:

That there is established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of war risk insurance, the director of which shall be entitled to a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

On page 3, line 15, after "Treasury," to insert: "but not to exceed $25 a day each, while actually employed."

On page 4, line 12, after "insurance," to insert "including the payment of salaries herein authorized and other personal services in the District of Columbia."

On page 4, to strike out lines 15 to 19, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized whenever, in his judgment, the necessity of further war insurance by the United States shall have ceased to exist, to suspend the operations of this act in so far as it authorizes insurance by the United States against loss or damage by risks of war, which suspension shall be made, at any event, within two years after the passage of this act, but shall not affect any insurance outstanding at the time or any claims pending adjustment. For the purpose of the final adjustment of any such outstanding insurance or claims, the bureau of war-risk insurance may, in the discretion of the President, be continued in existence a further period not exceeding one year.

On page 4, after line 19, to insert:

SEC. 10. That a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act and of all receipts hereunder shall be submitted to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

And, on page 4, line 20, to strike out "10" and insert "11."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is what is known as the war-risk insurance bill. The House has made several amendments to the bill which really improve its text and do not in any respect modify or change its policy as indicates in the bill passed by the SSenate. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EUROPEAN CRISIS.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I have here two documents which I wish to ask unanimous consent to have printed as one public document. One of these documents is what is known as the British "White Paper," issued by the British Government and containing correspondence respecting the European crisis. The other contains Germany's reasons for war with Russia, issued by the German foreign office. Both of these papers, Mr. President, are of the most intense interest, and I think, taken together, will give a good idea of the stand of each of the belligerent parties in the present European contest. I therefore ask unanimous consent that they may be printed together as a single public document.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President.——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I relied upon the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] to object to the documents being printed without being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and therefore I did not interpose an objection to the request made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is absent, and as the Senator from Indiana is acting chairman of that committee I did not feel at liberty to make the motion to refer the documents to the committee until he had had the opportunity to do so. I move that the documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no objection whatever to the documents taking that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The documents will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RECESS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Monday, August 31, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 1, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, lead us, we beseech Thee, by Thy spirit into the realms of higher thought, that the godlike in our being may blossom into golden deeds which Thou canst look upon with Thine approving smile; that we may thus glorify Thee, honor ourselves, and add dignity to this body, which should ever be the highest intellectual, moral, and spiritual reflection of the great people whom it represents. This we ask, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were ordered to be closed and the Sergeant at Arms to notify the absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Esch	Hoxworth	Oglesby
Aiken	Estopinal	Jones	O'Leary
Ainey	Evans	Kelley, Mich.	O'Shaunessy
Allen	Fairchild	Kent	Patten, N. Y.

Edmonds	Hinds	Mott	Watkins
Elder	Hobson	Murdock	Wilson, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this call 307 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

EUROPEAN DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the official correspondence respecting the European crisis, as presented to both houses of Parliament, by command of His Majesty the King of England, at the beginning of hostilities on the other side of the water.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to have printed as a House document the official correspondence of various nations of the Old World now engaged in war. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. FITZGERALD objected.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentlemen reserve their objections?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is at this time proper to insert in any official publication of any branch or department of this Government correspondence or papers referring to or discussing the reasons for the European war. For that reason I object.

Mr. MOORE. I ask the gentleman to reserve his objection that I may make a short statement. I think the gentleman from Tennessee and I are agreed upon the desirability of not agitating this subject.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not wish to be discourteous to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I do not believe there should be any statement upon the floor of the Congress referring to the merits or demerits, the causes or lack of causes, of the present war among the European nations.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman from Tennessee object to having a motion made that this go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? It is a matter of information only.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do object to that. Let us in this official body be careful to preserve neutrality in spirit and in fact.

Mr. MOORE. The matter was brought to the attention of the State Department and the German Embassy. There has been so much misinformation about the facts leading up to the war that the publication of these official diplomatic letters and telegrams may help to clear up the situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. For the reasons already stated, and which I believe to be good, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4920. An act to increase the cost of construction of Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution to correct error in H. R. 12045.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4920. An act to increase the cost of construction of Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

COMPENSATION FOR TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS (H. DOC. NO. 1155).

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a report from the joint committee on second-class mail matter and compensation for transportation of the mail.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report of the joint committee on postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for transportation of the mails.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Speaker, this report simply covers the compensation of railroads for transportation of the mail, which was a part of the work of the commission. The report for the balance of the work will be submitted later.

Mr. MANN. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the report will be ordered printed and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. It is ordered printed and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am anxious that the House may have an opportunity to dispose of the entire Unanimous Consent Calendar before we reach an adjournment. I am satisfied that to-morrow can be occupied in that way without seriously inconveniencing public business, and I ask unanimous consent that business in order on the first and third Monday of each month shall be in order to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to exercise, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Alaskan coal bill has come to be almost an emergency. I have telegrams addressed to the Secretary of the Interior and myself from the governor and all the chambers of commerce up there, asking that something be done in regard to the Alaskan coal situation. They are about to be cut off from their only supply, which is Canada. I urge that no more matters be put in ahead of the Alaskan coal bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think there is somewhat of a discrepancy between the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama and his final request. In the statement he says that he wants to get up the unanimous-consent business, but he finally asks that to-morrow shall be set aside so that there may be motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I did not state that I only wanted to get up the unanimous-consent business. I said I wanted to dispose of the Unanimous Consent Calendar; but I will also state that there is a bill on the calendar known as the Lubin resolution which a great many people in the country are much interested in. I am hoping late to-morrow afternoon, if this order is agreed to, that the Speaker will allow that to come up under a motion for suspension if it is not already reached under the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would the gentleman be willing to include that limitation in his request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would prefer to leave the question to the Speaker. I do not think he is going into motions to suspend the rule. Of course, I would have to do it if the gentleman objects. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection, but leave that to the Speaker.

I can assure the gentleman that I do not think suspensions generally are going to be taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STANDARD BOX FOR APPLES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill (S. 4517) to establish a standard box for apples, and for other purposes. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] if a similar bill is on the House Calendar?

Mr. ASHBROOK. There is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. How does that bill get in at this time?

The SPEAKER. It gets in under the rule.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule that there are two classes of business which you can lay before the House straight from the Speaker's table. One of them is a Senate bill, where a House bill of similar tenor has been reported and is on the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That House bill has not been considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary for the House to consider it. It must be on the calendar, and if this Senate bill is passed, then the House will, by unanimous consent, lay the House bill on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is this bill in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. A bill that affects all the apples in the country?

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference what it affects.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has this bill ever been before the committee?

The SPEAKER. You can not make rules for special bills. A rule has to be general.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the committee ever authorized the consideration of this bill or reported it?

The SPEAKER. The House bill is already on the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I know; but the Senate bill is not necessarily the same as the House bill.

The SPEAKER. But it happens to be in this particular case, so the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] says.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This is the Senate bill and not the House bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. The bill is exactly the same. There is one amendment. Otherwise it is the same as the House bill submitted by the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the House bill on the Union Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is on the House Calendar.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then it is in order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman whether the committee has directed him to call this up.

The SPEAKER. If the House objects to the consideration of the bill, then the Chair will have to refer it to the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I certainly object.

The SPEAKER. But we have not got to the place where the gentleman can object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All right then.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, has there been any direction from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures that this bill be considered?

The SPEAKER. What committee does this bill come from?

Mr. ASHBROOK. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. Now, what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. SCOTT. The question is, Has the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures directed that this bill be taken up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Or authorized it?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have not considered the Senate bill, but they have considered House bill 11178.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures authorized the gentleman to bring it up?

Mr. ASHBROOK. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has not authorized me to bring up the Senate bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is what I mean.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But it is on the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I insist that it has not authorized the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My understanding is——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will give the Chair a chance to rule, he will rule in the gentleman's favor. [Laughter.] The last clause of the rule requires this to be made on motion directed by the committee. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] will get his committee together and get authorization, then he can get his bill up. Otherwise he can not.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a request for indefinite leave of absence on account of illness for the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HOXWORTH, which request is accompanied with a certificate of a physician that it is dangerous for Mr. HOXWORTH to undertake to come to Washington. Is there objection to this request?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. EVANS, for two days, on account of serious illness.

To Mr. WOODRUFF, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—PUBLIC LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18531) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to certify to the Secretary of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, lands in the State of Louisiana not needed for naval purposes, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 14233, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there are to be six hours of general debate, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and three hours by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is absent from the city on account of sickness, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] have control of the time in his stead.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the agreement was that the gentleman from Idaho would control the time if the gentleman from Wisconsin were not here. It does not take unanimous consent.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the rule require that in general debate remarks shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule all debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill under consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that four hours of the debate allotted on this bill be transferred to the succeeding bill, which is the general coal bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can not grant any such request as that.

Mr. MANN. The committee would not have that power.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it is the sense of the committee that we should not necessarily devote six hours to the discussion of this bill, is there no means by which the committee can curtail that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that not exceeding six hours shall be consumed in general debate, but the committee has no authority to provide that the time for general debate fixed in the rule upon some other bill shall be extended beyond the time fixed in the rule. Whenever general debate upon this bill is exhausted the bill will be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, as the House is well aware, this is the Alaska coal leasing bill, intended to go as a companion bill to the Alaskan railroad bill, so that the Alaska coal fields may be opened and before proceeding with the debate. I desire to read two or three telegrams and letters from the Alaskan people showing the dire necessity for legislation along this line, so that the House may know something about the demands up there. These communications quite well, I think, show the pressing need not only for legislation but for early legislation. These communications are as follows:

HAINES, ALASKA, August 11, 1914.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.:

Request that Alaska coal lands be opened; British Columbia supply liable to be cut off. Good chance Alaskans establish market.

HAINES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

JUNEAU, ALASKA, August 13, 1914.

The PRESIDENT,
Washington:

Alaskans deem it necessary opening our coal fields on account British Columbia supply liable being cut off, due to war.

JUNEAU CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

CORDOVA, ALASKA, August 12, 1914.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Washington, D. C:

British Columbia coal, Alaska's only supply, liable to be withheld any day. Can't you give us legislative assistance opening our coal?

CORDOVA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

TERRITORY OF ALASKA, GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Juneau, August 13, 1914.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: The necessity for the opening of Alaska coal lands for commercial purposes is emphasized by the war conditions now existing in Europe, and the further fact that the people of Alaska are nearly wholly dependent upon British Columbia for their coal supply. The various commercial bodies of this Territory, and the people generally, are a unit in urging upon the Congress the speedy enactment of such legislation as will have for its object the opening of the Alaska coal fields to development on a commercial basis. No specific bill now before the Congress is urged, it being the chief desire of the people of this Territory to secure such legislation as will permit them to obtain coal, at least for domestic purposes, at home, where a great abundance of it could be mined.

The conditions now being developed because of the war in Europe, and those other conditions which will undoubtably arise during the progress of the conflict, after its close, together with the readjustment of international affairs and conditions, that is bound to follow, all point to the urgent necessity of securing legislation that will permit the development of our coal resources for domestic and industrial purposes, as well as for the use of the Government of the United States. Should the present war be of long continuance it is not unlikely that the coal supply which we now receive from British Columbia might be cut off and a condition would inevitably be created that would be well-nigh calamitous.

Respectfully,

J. F. A. STRONG, Governor.

CORDOVA, ALASKA, August 14, 1914.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully call your attention to the necessity for immediate action in the matter of throwing open Alaska coal. We do not presume to suggest the method by which this should be done. What we do insist upon is that it is absolutely necessary to open it in some way at once, either through a leasing system, private ownership, or Government operation, to the end that the coal may be used, not only in Alaska, but on the Pacific coast as well.

In support of this proposition we submit that practically all the coal consumed in Alaska, as well as a large percentage of that used on the Pacific coast, comes from British Columbia. Should this supply be cut off through the war now raging over all Europe, our industries, few as they are, will be paralyzed, and widespread desolation will follow.

If Canada herself does not see fit to prohibit the exportation of coal, there is nothing to prevent the nations at war with Great Britain from capturing English coal on the high seas or even destroying the works on the British Columbia coast.

The war has already resulted in a large increase in the price of all foodstuffs and supplies in this northland; and with the decrease in the value of copper, the indications are that these mines will be shut down.

Foreign capital is being withdrawn and the mines operated and developed by this money closed down. As an example we point to the Jualin mine at Juneau and the Mother Lode of the Copper River section, both of which have ceased work since war was declared.

To Alaska the situation is serious, and we believe it is of equal consequence to the United States as a whole.

The coal for naval use on the Pacific has been brought around from the Atlantic. To bring this coal to the Pacific it was necessary to use foreign vessels. These foreign vessels are no longer available. There are no American ships for this purpose. Every vessel that flies the American flag which can by any possibility be used for the purpose will be needed for our over-sea trade, to take the place of foreign ships that have been withdrawn from trade. The opening of Alaska coal is therefore a national necessity. It is a necessary part in the scheme of national defense, and the last few weeks have demonstrated that we can not afford to neglect any possible measure tending to strengthen our national defense.

If it is urged that the coal in Alaska is not suited to naval use, we reply that the test made was simply a test of one vein of coal and is therefore no proof of the field. We confidently assert that the Bering River field has large quantities of coal suitable for naval use, and refer to such eminent geologists as Drs. Brooks and Morton, of the United States Geological Survey, as our authorities.

The Bering River field can be opened and coal placed on the market at Cordova in 90 days from the beginning of construction. A line of railroad 25 miles long, branching from mile 38 on the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad, will reach to the heart of the field.

With these conditions surrounding us, we respectfully ask: "Is it the part of good judgment to longer delay the opening of Alaska coal on some basis, either by a leasing bill of such liberal provisions that American capital will undertake it or by Government operation?"

We appeal to you, who have the power and authority to do this, to give it your earnest and conscientious consideration, believing that you will arrive at the same conclusion that we have, viz, that the opening of Alaska coal is not only an absolute necessity but a duty that Congress should at once perform.

Very respectfully,

By CORDOVA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
——— ———, President.
H. G. STEEL, Secretary.

I have just presented a letter from the governor of Alaska under date of August 13, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, which shows the urgent demand for some legislation in Alaska, so that these coal fields may be opened there. I have also some other letters and resolutions, which I shall not read, from Alaskan chambers of commerce, asking that some relief be given. When the Delegate from Alaska, Mr. WICKERSHAM, presents this matter to you a few minutes later he will be able to show you even more cogent reasons for hasty action.

Passing from this, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to conditions in Alaska with reference to the coal, coal lands, their area, and so forth. If I am able to do so, I desire to give you some idea of the conditions in Alaska, some idea of the coal fields in Alaska, some idea of the litigation and trouble they have had up there, and to show you that something is necessary. The total area of Alaska is 590,884 square miles, or one-fifth the size of the United States.

The known areas of coal-bearing rocks of Alaska, according to the Geological Survey, include about 16,000 square miles (12,240,000 acres), and of this 1,210 square miles (774,400 acres) is pretty definitely known to be underlain by workable coal beds.

It is roughly estimated that the Bering and Matanuska fields each contain from one to three billion tons of coal, while it is estimated that the Nenana field contains nine billion tons of lignite coal.

These are conceded to be the main coal fields and the ones that are most accessible. These fields will soon be developed, if Congress will but afford the opportunity. The withdrawals of November, 1906, has brought everything to a standstill.

The House, of course, will be aware that these are but rough estimates of the tonnage, but they were the best estimates that the committee could get from the Geological Survey, and we thought that that was the best place to get information. I repeat, the two main high-grade coal fields in Alaska are the Bering River and the Matanuska. The Tanana coal field referred to in this bill is up near Fairbanks and is a very large field of lignite coal in the interior, but of not such high grade as the two fields nearer the coast, and, of course, less inexhaustible. This field will be used locally for mining and interior development, and it is thought will not stand shipment on account of freight rates. The United States coal-land laws were made applicable to Alaska by the act of June 5, 1900 (31 Stat., 598). There were later enactments on the subject.

None of these coal-land laws provided for any sort of lease, but all provided for the patenting in fee of the land. All unentered Alaskan coal lands were withdrawn from entry November 12, 1906, and since that time this country has been closed up, so far as their coal resources are concerned, as tight as a drum. Only two claims in all Alaska have ever reached patent, one of about 160 acres and one of about 50 acres, and those two fields are lignite fields.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield with pleasure; yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman state to the committee how many claims have been filed on, and how much money the Government has in the Treasury from men who have entered coal lands in the Matanuska and the Bering River fields, and whose claims have not been passed on by the department?

Mr. FERRIS. I have that in my remarks, and I will reach it. I might answer the gentleman hurriedly and say that there are 1,129 claims, all told, and that some 561 of these have been heard and rejected, 566 still pending, and only 2 passed to patent.

Mr. BOOHER. How much money has been placed in the Treasury by the men who have applied for patents?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not have those figures at hand. I am very sorry I have not them here.

Mr. BOOHER. Three hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars, is it not?

Mr. FERRIS. I am neither able to corroborate nor deny the gentleman's figures. If he has looked it up, no doubt he is correct.

Mr. BOOHER. What provision has the gentleman made in this bill for taking care of the claims of men who have filed final proof with the Interior Department and whose claims have not been finally determined?

Mr. FERRIS. None at all. It was the specific intention not to do so. We proposed to leave them in statu quo. Section 14, on page 11, discloses that we neither add to nor take away any right.

Mr. BOOHER. Why not?

Mr. FERRIS. Every law is left in vogue that was in vogue when they filed; everything is left to them that they had originally. I think I know what the gentleman has in mind. There are many men up there who have been trying to secure patents upon their land. Their thought is that they ought to have a chance to go into the local courts and try them out, but I think the gentleman will agree with me that the committee was not justified in pursuing any such course as that. The department is not willing to take such a course as that, and the House ought not to be willing to take such a course as that.

Mr. BOOHER. If that is the policy of the Interior Department now, it is different from the view taken by the one it succeeded. Secretary Fisher advocated it, and the Committee on the Territories reported a bill to take care of those claims. Now, this bill is silent on that subject entirely.

Mr. FERRIS. The committee purposely stated in their report and purposely admitted in the committee that they were not willing to provide specifically that men who, perhaps, acquired claims fraudulently should have any additional course other than the one provided under existing law, and that was the unanimous view of the committee, as I understand it, and I know it to be the view of the department, because the department sat with us and helped us frame this bill in the way in which it was brought in here. The present law will protect them if they have rights; if they have none, this committee would not be justified in further tying up Alaska in trying to give them rights.

Mr. BOOHER. I did not refer to fraudulent claims, but I am referring to claims taken up by men in good faith, who have made entries, spent money and paid it into the Treasury of the United States, and this is now being withheld, and for five years their claims have been undecided and the Government holds their money. What provision does the gentleman make to take care of those people?

Mr. FERRIS. My answer to the gentleman is that if the claim is a straight, square, fair claim, they can acquire title under the existing law. They have an ample chance to get a title. Otherwise they are not entitled to any new trials or additional tribunals. Now, in reference to the gentleman's question. To show that a great majority of the claims are fraudulent, in eight long years only two of them have been permitted to proceed to patent. Five hundred and sixty-six of them have been tried, and every one of them has been turned down, and the other 561—my figures may not be exact—are now pending and will in all probability pass to patent or be rejected, as their relative rights appear.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman permit there one more question, and it is only one question. Now, suppose some of those claims that are still pending are held by genuine claimants and free from fraud, and the men are entitled to patent and the Government had already rented that land. How are we going to get at that situation?

Mr. FERRIS. The bill specifically provides that we are not taking away any vested rights up there of any man. It could not be done if we tried. We are not trying to do that. The bill does not do that.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Is the money paid back to the locator or applicant?

Mr. FERRIS. If canceled for fraud, I do not understand it will. In that event he is not entitled to profit by his own wrong. If he is straight he will get a patent.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. GOULDEN. Are these coal fields, the Bering River and the Matanuska, available for use at this time; are they so situated that they can be reached and the coal shipped out for commercial purposes?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes; they are close to the coast. One of them is 25 miles inland from the navigable waters, the other is some 70 miles inland, but can easily be reached by a short line of railroad.

Mr. GOULDEN. So that the coal can be reached?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; the two fields are quite accessible.

Mr. GOULDEN. Are there any railroads near them at this time?

Mr. FERRIS. There will be. As the gentleman knows, railroads are few and far between there now.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the Government proposed railroad we have decided to build reach those fields?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not answer the gentleman definitely, because we have not yet got the information as to exactly where the railroad will be located, but the engineers are up there for that purpose and in all probability they will. The President locates them and undoubtedly he will build to these fields.

Mr. GOULDEN. This bill simply provides for a survey and the manner of leasing the lands, as I understand it.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The question propounded by the gentleman from New York was the one I had in mind. Why is there such a necessity or emergency unless you can reach these coal fields? If these coal fields are not available for transportation, how can those people who seek the benefit of this coal by this legislation be benefited until there is transportation furnished to take the coal to the consumer?

Mr. FERRIS. They have some transportation there now. There is some water navigation now and they have some transportation. The coal will also be used locally to some extent.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Does this bill reserve any right to the Government for the purpose of getting coal for the use of the Navy?

Mr. FERRIS. It does; we make a 5,120-acre reservation in the heart of the Bering coal field and a 7,680-acre reservation in the heart of the Matanuska coal field, and still another in the heart of the Nenana coal field. We have reserved these large areas for the Government, so it can take out the coal it needs for Navy, Army, and Government needs generally. I think the gentleman will agree we have protected our Government pretty well in this regard. Some think we have reserved too much.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman recall the number of acres in the Bering River field or in the Matanuska field, so that we may know what proportion is reserved? Does the gentleman recall the figures?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; in the Bering field the bill reserves 5,120 acres; in the Matanuska, 7,680 acres; and, in addition, the President may make similar reservations in each of the remaining fields.

All known Alaskan coal lands were withdrawn from entry November 12, 1906, and since that time Alaska has been at a standstill, and there has been little or no development along this particular line. The total number of claims presented in Alaska under coal-land laws is 1,126. The total number of claims canceled to date is 561. The total number of claims patented is 2. The number of claims now pending is 566, many of which have been held for rejection by the General Land Office and are pending on appeal. Some of the claims are almost ready for final determination, and some are still being investigated for fraud and irregularity.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman please tell when the department thinks it will get through investigating these claims?

Mr. FERRIS. We had the department before us, and asked them on that specific point, and they said that they were speeding along with it as fast as they could. Alaska is a country, as the gentleman knows, where the field agents can not work all the year around, but they say they are proceeding as fast as they can. Their task has not been an easy one. They have been compelled to move with caution. Of course we all hoped when the withdrawals came, eight years ago, these matters could have been adjudicated sooner, but the conditions are more complicated than we know.

Mr. BOOHER. I am satisfied they have not.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman what kinds of coal are found in Alaska?

Mr. FERRIS. Some of the fields back of the interior they do not know much about. The Nenana field is estimated to be a 900,000,000,000-ton field, and is lignite. The Matanuska and Bering River coal fields have a bituminous coal and some anthracite coal which is a merchantable coal. There is some difference of opinion about it as a naval coal, but it is good coal for most purposes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. As far as you know, how many acres of coal land are found in Alaska?

Mr. FERRIS. I will give it to the gentleman. The known areas of coal-bearing rock in Alaska are 12,240,000 acres. Seven hundred and seventy-four thousand four hundred acres of land are definitely known to have coal under it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask you another question?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. How many acres of coal land, so far as known, are owned by private parties in Alaska?

Mr. FERRIS. Scarcely any at all. Less than 200 acres. Only two claims have ever gone to patent. One has about 160 acres and the other has approximately 50 acres. The two together aggregate about 200 acres. It is one of the most amazing things that can be called to the attention of the House that Alaska, with all her coal, could never get enough coal to put in a cook stove as the laws now stand. The withdrawals were made in 1906, eight years ago, and since that time that Territory has been tied up as tight as a drum.

Mr. BOOHER. And all the coal, let me suggest, that they have used in Alaska since that time has been imported, most of it from British Columbia.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. Some of it has been imported from the State of Washington, but most of it from British Columbia. I will give the figures later.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If this bill is enacted into law, do you think it will result in the coal fields of Alaska being operated with success?

Mr. FERRIS. The Department of the Interior thinks so and the committee thinks so. As the gentleman knows, there are many problems difficult and hard to fathom in the framing of a law that will be workable and at the same time prevent the grafters from gobbling up those vast coal areas.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Are the known fields that you speak of, that have been discovered, in a locality where the proposed railroad is to be built?

Mr. FERRIS. No one as yet knows where the railroad is to be built. As the gentleman knows, the Alaska railroad bill authorized the President to locate the line or lines wheresoever he would, from the coast back to the interior of the country, and he has not yet located them.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Are these coal fields so located that you can build a railroad to them?

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly. One of them is about 25 miles from the coast and the other is about 70 miles from the coast.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. One other question. Why is it that they have not been able to get enough coal, as you say, for a cook stove?

Mr. FERRIS. For the simple reason that in 1906 the Government made up its mind that the Alaska coal fields were about to be frittered away by fraudulent claimants. The gentleman recalls the noise we had about the Cunningham coal claims and about the fraudulent entries and the graft that was going on up there. In order to prevent that trouble, whether properly or improperly, the policy has been to withdraw all that coal land, and they will not let anybody have a patent up there.

Mr. WILLIS. I made a little computation here. I find the gentleman's bill reserves one-fifth of the Bering field to the United States and one-ninth of the Matanuska field, and that in all the rest of Alaska there are only 8 square miles reserved. Does the gentleman think that is sufficient reservation for governmental purposes?

Mr. FERRIS. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withdraw areas in any other coal field in his discretion.

Mr. WILLIS. In his statement he is limited in the amount he may withdraw?

Mr. FERRIS. In a single field; yes. It is all withdrawn now. We surely do not want to keep it all withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIS. And, in his discretion, the President may reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or other disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing lands in each of the other coal fields in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely; but, as the gentleman knows, there are 12,240,000 acres of coal-bearing rock in Alaska; and as the gentleman also knows, there are 474,000 acres of land that are known to be valuable for coal. If we take 5,120 acres out of the two main fields and then authorize the Secretary to make similar reservations in every other field, I think the majority of people would say we would have reserved too much instead of too little. I know that contention was strenuously made; and, of course, the gentleman from Ohio knows that there should be some development in Alaska, and the good friends of Alaska do not want to again tie it all up so that it can not move. We have had withdrawals in toto for eight years past that have kept everything at a standstill, and no one wants that to occur any longer.

The bill H. R. 14233 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease in areas of 40 acres or multiples thereof upward to 2,500 acres. In the Bering and Matanuska fields, which are near the coast and are of known value, quantity, and area, small tracts will be leased. In the interior, where low-grade coal exists, larger areas can with safety and propriety be leased.

The Secretary of the Interior fixes the royalty, which shall not be less than 2 cents per ton, and coupled with this a competitive feature is added as an additional safeguard.

The bill contains a competitive feature pursuant to advertisement to determine priority of application; also to prevent favoritism, bringing increased revenues, and so forth, which is thought to be a wholesome method. It is thought this will be relief to the administration of the estate as well, for all applicants will have an equal chance.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] will readily observe that in a territory that has 12,000,000 acres of coal, if he is allowed to withdraw 5,000 acres in each field the question to be considered is, Have we not withdrawn almost too much?

This is not to be granted in fee; it is merely to be leased. The Government gets a royalty on every ton of coal.

The Secretary is authorized and directed to withdraw 5,120 acres of coal land for Army, Navy, and other Government use in the Bering and Matanuska coal fields of Alaska. He is also given discretionary authority to withdraw 5,120 acres in each of the remaining coal fields, but as to the latter-named coal fields back in the interior of the country the withdrawal of such areas is not mandatory, but within his discretion. This to some may seem to be a reservation larger than is necessary, when the land is to be only leased and the lease so well safeguarded, but it was the thought of the committee that the Government should have the cream of each field, and if this should prove unwise it could easily be restored. But if we let it get away, the difficulty would be to get it returned.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that point will he yield to me?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the gentleman to state that this reservation could be made for the purpose of use by the Army or the Navy; especially for the Navy, of course.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; or for any other governmental purpose.

Mr. WILLIS. Suppose there should subsequently be a coal monopoly on the Pacific coast, and the Government should desire to enter into the mining of coal for the purpose of breaking up that monopoly, would it have the power to do that under this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. On page 2, line 22, there is a provision as follows:

Provided, That the deposits in said reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the coal is required for Government works or in the construction and operation of Government railroads, or is required by the Navy, or is necessary for national protection or for relief from oppressive conditions brought about through a monopoly of coal.

Now, I think that answers the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. That is a wise provision.

Mr. FERRIS. No railroad is allowed to take a lease for commercial purposes, but is allowed to mine and work only for its own use. Now, I think the House will know and will readily recognize that most of the coal monopolies, most of the food monopolies, most of the oppressive conditions in oil, gas, and everything else, are where the producer owns the transportation as well. In my State they oppress us because the pipe-line companies own the oil wells, and will not ship for anybody else. In Pennsylvania they oppress the people because they own both the coal mines, the anthracite coal fields, and the railroads. Your committee tried as best it could and put it in in terms positive and emphatic that a railroad could mine coal for its own use, but for that alone.

Sections 5 and 6 of the bill prevent lessees from interlocking or owning an interest in other leases, and provide for forfeiture and penal provisions for the violation thereof. I think that is wise. Some gentlemen may say it is not workable, but I do not see why it is not. Surely no one would advocate that we go to Alaska and let one syndicate or one company or one man or one monopoly or one financial interest own the entire Territory of Alaska.

The lease period under the bill is for an indeterminate period, subject to new conditions, royalty, and so forth, at each 20-year period. The new regulations, new royalties, and so forth, would be commensurate with equity and justice at that time. The lease period is for an indefinite time, or until the coal is worked out of the leased areas. This is thought to be wise. This is the practice in most leases. The lease contract is to contain a provision that allows the Government to step in at the end of 20 years and overhaul the proposition and refix the rates and make the conditions applicable to the situation then existing.

There is a 10-acre provision in section 8 for the purpose of aiding small miners, homesteaders, and so forth, in the development of Alaska. But this permit is only temporary. It was the thought of your Committee on the Public Lands that we wanted to make a bill that would be helpful to every part of Alaska. We wanted to make a bill that would encourage homesteading and the development of every nook and corner of Alaska, and, if possible, we wanted to make it so that each little local community could get coal for its own use in small areas, without being under the thumb of the big concerns, operating under big leases.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the maximum amount that can be operated?

Mr. FERRIS. Twenty-five hundred and sixty acres, or four sections. But that is the maximum. It could be any amount lower than that.

Under the bill the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease the surface and the coal deposits separately, retaining the surface area for agriculture when deemed feasible. As the House is well aware, the modern conservation idea is to use the minerals, the coal, the oil, the gas, or all valuable strata beneath the surface for the best purpose, to wit, that of mining, and to use the surface of the soil in producing foodstuffs for the support of the American people; and we think we have followed that plan out here to its correct analysis.

There can be no assignment of the lease without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. In other words, dummy entrymen and stool pigeons can not go up there and get hold of Alaska and immediately thereafter transfer by assignment into a syndicate that would probably become oppressive and heavy-handed on the Alaskan people.

The bill makes it mandatory that each lease shall contain a provision authorizing the subsequent supervision by the department, thereby insuring diligence, skill, protection of the property, prevention of waste, and such other provisions for the benefit of the United States as may be necessary.

The prevention of monopoly and the safeguarding of the public welfare are also provisions that go into the lease. This is perhaps the most far-reaching and advanced section in the bill, and it is the thought of the committee that this provision in the last analysis will do more for the Alaskan people than has ever yet been done for them along the line of regulation, because if the relative rights of the Government and the lessee, respectively, are written into the lease, surely the lessee will be bound by its very terms. Surely the Federal Government will know what its rights are, and surely if the Federal Government through the Secretary of the Interior makes a bad or defective lease, there will be a place to put a finger on the responsibility.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the bill in its present form permit the making of a lease upon such terms that the Government will exercise any right or authority over the price at which the coal is to be sold?

Mr. FERRIS. The bill as it stands has no price-fixing regulation in it. The Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] has submitted to the committee an amendment which would accomplish that, and the other day, when we were talking about getting this bill up under suspension of the rules, in an effort to meet the emergency indicated by the telegrams which have been received, our committee agreed to accept that, and I personally agreed to accept it; and unless the House overthrows us it will no doubt be received in the bill when it goes through. There was a thought in the minds of the committee as it originally drafted the bill, and of the department, that probably to fix the price of the products of the mine in far-away Alaska might prevent development, and it was the thought of the committee and the department that we wanted to be doubly safe and doubly careful not to drive away honest, straightforward development. For that reason we left out that provision. However, the judgment of the Delegate from Alaska ought to be better than ours on this subject, and it is his opinion that some such provision ought to be in the bill, and he has an amendment, which I understand he intends to offer, covering that subject.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is, it permits the Secretary of the Interior, when he makes this lease, to fix the price at which the coal is to be sold?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the bill in its present form permit the lease to be made to the man who will pay a nominal royalty of 2 cents a ton, or whatever royalty may be fixed, with the proviso that the lease is to be given to the miner who will sell the coal at seaports for the lowest price?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not sure that I have the gentleman's idea exactly in mind, but let me tell the gentleman what the bill does, and that may perhaps answer the question. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior may first fix the rental, which shall in no case be less than 2 cents a ton. That is the minimum, but the gentleman will notice that there is no maximum. He may make it as high as he can secure bids, and in addition, he may ask for competitive bids, so that the Government will derive the best possible price from it.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is, the man who will pay the largest royalty, assuming that he satisfies the Government he can properly handle his contract, will be given the lease. Does the bill give the authority to the Secretary of the Interior to make a lease based on a minimum royalty of 2 cents to the man who will deliver the coal for the lowest price at seaport?

Mr. FERRIS. The Secretary is given full discretion in carrying out the act. He can incorporate in the lease any provision he wants to, and can lease it to anybody he wants to. I feel sure there is no doubt about that. The bill is so drawn as to give the Secretary the power to grant these leases in such a way that they will be in the public interest and for the best interest of the community. He necessarily must have latitude to get anything done up there. Hard-and-fast rules will not accomplish it. To do that would simply be supplying Alaska and the United States Government with a law that would not work. To use a slang phrase, it would be selling a razor that would not shave.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me, right on that point? Does the gentleman understand the provision of the bill to give the Secretary authority to call for bids based partly on the proposed selling price of the coal?

Mr. FERRIS. The bill gives the Secretary of the Interior a free hand, to do everything and anything he can for the benefit of the public interest in granting these leases. His authority is almost without bridle, and it was the thought of the committee that that was the way it ought to be.

Mr. MONDELL. It would require rather definite authority to authorize the Secretary to do that, and I had not supposed that the bill did that.

Mr. FERRIS. I did not quite catch the gentleman's remark.

Mr. MONDELL. It would require rather definite authority to authorize the Secretary to do that, and I have not read anything in the bill which seems to me to authorize the Secretary to make that kind of a condition.

Mr. FERRIS. The Secretary, under a distinct and separate paragraph, is given authority to work out rules and regulations and to prepare such leases as will safeguard the public interest and develop Alaska for the benefit of Alaska, and for the general welfare, and I think there is no doubt that he has authority to do this if it seemed best. Of course, I am not passing on whether or not it would be best to do that. The varied conditions up there will call for brains and latitude both. The bill gives the latitude, and I am sure the present incumbent has the brains and industry to work out the plan.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think, after having made a thorough study of this, that if the Secretary of the Interior is given the power to regulate the price at which the coal shall be sold he will ever make any leases for the mining of the coal?

Mr. FERRIS. That is a question for the gentleman to debate. The committee and the department in the preparation of this bill were of the opinion that probably a price-fixing provision might retard development, and for that reason we left it out.

Mr. MADDEN. It certainly would retard development.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] feels very keenly about it. I do not want to put words in his mouth, because he will present his own view, and I should not do that; but the gentleman from Alaska has an amendment which I hope he will call to the gentleman's attention. The amendment he offers is on all fours with the provision in the Adamson water-power bill and with the water-power bill from the Committee on the Public Lands. Whether it is advisable or not is a question for this House.

Mr. MADDEN. The price of the coal will have to depend on the market?

Mr. FERRIS. Very true.

Mr. MADDEN. And if the Secretary of the Interior, sitting here, with his manifold duties to perform, should undertake to regulate what somebody shall pay for coal, there would not be any coal sold.

Mr. FERRIS. Of course, the gentleman will find some difference of opinion about that. There is, of course, room for debate as to the advisability of it. I want it to go in if it does not scare away development; but I want development. I do not want our Government to longer leave Alaska chained hand and foot like a Prometheus. It has been tied up too long now.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman think it is a safe provision to enact into law, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease for an indeterminate period on a minimum royalty of 2 cents per ton? Does not the gentleman think that is a very low royalty?

Mr. FERRIS. Of course the 2 cents per ton is only the minimum. There is no maximum. We compared that with what they are doing in foreign countries—compared it with Canada, compared it with Australia, compared it with New Zealand, and compared it with the State laws in the West that have leasing laws—and the 2 cents minimum and the competitive feature was our best judgment. The gentleman knows you can not lay down a hard and fast rule that will govern in all these situations. For example, one field will be easy to attack, accessible to railroad facilities, and accessible to market. There the royalty ought to be high. Another field will be crushed from volcanic action, inaccessible, expensive to mine, and will be of little value. Here undoubtedly the rate ought to be low. To have it otherwise is to get no development, no royalty, and no coal. This provision is approved by the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, the Interior Department, and our entire committee. I do not think we have made any mistake in that. Undoubtedly the Secretary of the Interior has got to give some latitude. If the gentleman will remember, two or three years ago the Public Lands Committee brought in a bill and tried to lay down a hard and fast rule to govern the case. The thought of many in the House, and a good many out of it, is that there ought to be hard and fast rules laid down; but no such bill, I think, can be passed through this House, and no such bill ought to be passed through the House. If you did, you would make it so that the royalty in some cases would be outrageously high, in other fields disgracefully low, and totally unworkable as well.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. I agree with much that the gentleman has said, but I want to ask him if with usual care and accuracy he has investigated the royalties provided for in other States and countries, and whether they are as low as they are in this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes, I have; the minimum is oftentimes low. Sometimes they have a minimum and a maximum, and sometimes no minimum and no maximum, so the departmental officer who has charge of it can fix the royalty to fit each case. But this bill takes the double precaution of first fixing the royalty as best it can with all the information before it, and then in addition put it up and let it be bid upon so that you will be sure to have a double chance of getting what the coal is worth—a double chance to protect the public interest.

Mr. WILLIS. I think it would be safer if you had a higher royalty.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. With pleasure.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Is it the intention to get back the money appropriated in the railroad bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; we have got to get the money back in the railroad bill, and everybody realizes the Alaskan people and the Delegate, who are fair and square, want to get the money back and so release them.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think the idea of fixing the rates by the Secretary of the Interior would counteract the making of revenue by the Government?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is just the best method to get at it.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. But the lower the rate the less revenue we get for the Government.

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly, but we have a Secretary of the Interior charged with the highest sort of duty, and he will expect to carry out, and no doubt will carry out, the wishes of Congress and the people.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. A 2-cent royalty will not get much revenue for the Government, and will not do much toward getting the railway money back.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman will recollect that this is not a 2-cent royalty. That is merely the minimum, so that it will allow the great lignite fields to be used locally. These coal lands will be put up for competitive bids, as the Interior Department does the Indian lands, and get the highest possible rate that the project will bear. So in each case we have a double chance to get the money for the railroad and the double chance of opening all the coal fields of Alaska and getting the most out of it possible.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to say that I do not see how it is possible, if we assume that the Secretary of the Interior will do his duty, which he will do, for us to lose anything under the bill in this particular section. Certainly, if the field is the lowest grade, it will only pay that amount, and we want it developed, and any other fields where it pays more the Secretary of the Interior is free to charge more, and it seems to me it is impossible for this bill to be wrong in that regard. I do not see how it is possible for this part of the bill to be a mistake.

Mr. FERRIS. I thank the gentleman; I think he has put it clearer than I could hope to do. Suppose we put a minimum of 5 or 6 cents a ton, more than any other country gets. The low-grade inaccessible coal areas would not even be scratched. Nobody wants that. The coal field near the home of the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] has probably 9,000,000,000 tons of low-grade lignite coal. It is good for the local use only. Does anyone want to put a minimum so high that they will not touch that? But on the fields near the coast, as was suggested by the gentleman from Washington, where the great fields of Bering and Matanuska are, accessible to navigable water, which is demanded for use, then, as the gentleman from Washington suggests, the Secretary of the Interior will put them up to competitive bids, as we do the Indian lands in our State, and we will get what they are worth.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. The gentleman has substantially answered the question that I intended to ask. If the royalty is made

2 cents it would stimulate a larger production of coal by making it cheaper for the contractor and more revenue for the Government and the railroad because the railroad carries the coal.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; all those things are to be considered. You would not want to make it so low that you would not get any results. If you do, the Government will get nothing and Alaska will remain stagnant and a wilderness, and we all know that it ought to be opened up.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that in the gentleman's own State and district several million acres of Indian lands were opened up at a minimum of $2.50 an acre, and a great deal of it was sold as high as $20 an acre?

Mr. FERRIS. That is very true.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And we had to further reduce it to $1.25 an acre from $5, and it required a second act before a good deal of the land was sold.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs would know more about the exact figures than I. I have no doubt that he has stated it correctly. I do know this: That we have coal, gas, and oil lands that belong to the Indians in our State, and that they are administered by the Interior Department. They put them up for competitive bids, and get all they can for them. They first appraise them, and if they do not get as much as the appraisement they do not lease them. In the next place, the man that pays the Indians the most for the land gets it and develops the land, and we are getting our State developed in that way, and the Indian is getting a royalty and the State is going forward. If our lands were withdrawn, if our lands were tied up, and if they had been withdrawn for eight years as the lands in Alaska have been withdrawn, we would be crying for aid, the same as Alaska. This condition up there is abnormal and should be corrected. I think this bill will accomplish it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice the bill provides that the lands shall be divided up into lots as small as 40 acres each?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that anybody would take the lease of 40 acres of coal land with any probability of developing it?

Mr. FERRIS. Probably not. The gentleman has in his mind the development of coal as being big business, and I think that is true, but I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it may give some locality or community or somebody a chance to work a small area, perchance a detached area that needed to be worked. I know what the gentleman has in mind, and I think he is right about it. There is no use talking about the coal business being a poor man's game. It is not. It costs thousands and thousands of dollars to put up a plant to mine coal, and anyone who thinks that we are passing a bill which will enable some individual to go out with a pick and shovel and mine coal is very much deluded. It is a big man's game. It needs careful regulation, but it needs also intelligent regulation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us what the area in leases in Oklahoma has been as a general thing?

Mr. FERRIS. Those coal leases are not in my district. I have read them and studied them, but offhand I can not tell the gentleman the exact area they contain. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. STEPHENS], may be able to tell the gentleman what these coal leases are at McAlester. I do not think there is any uniformity about it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not tell at present.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman knows that while he was a member of the committee some of the leases had expired.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is, they had worked out the area that they had leased and were seeking to get additional areas?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that 440,000 acres were set apart for coal, oil, and asphalt. I do not remember the exact amount, but a very small portion of that was leased and afterwards we had to change those terms and conditions.

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps I can call on my colleague from Oklahoma, Mr. MURRAY, to tell us what is the size of those leases, approximately, around McAlester, in his section of the country.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. There are 442,000 acres total. Does the gentleman want the size of the leases?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; that was Mr. BURKE's question.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The agreement provided for 960 acres, and I think they are based upon that plan.

Mr. FERRIS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This bill provides that the leases may run as high as 2,500 acres?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; that is true. This bill provides that leases may run from 40 acres to 2,500 acres.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take any more time upon the bill. The gentleman from Alaska, Mr. WICKERSHAM, is here, and he will be able to handle the matter much better than I. I want to say that it has not been an easy task for your committee to bring to the House a bill that would be workable, that would open Alaska, bring revenue to help pay off the appropriation for the new railway, and still leave sufficient teeth in the measure to prevent abuses.

Your committee has been tireless in its efforts to accomplish the above. Neither selfishness, partisanship, nor pride of opinion even presented themselves in the deliberations of your committee. During my seven years' service on the committee at no time has the committee striven harder to do its full duty than in this instance. Every line of the bill was carefully scrutinized, carefully weighed, and carefully drafted.

It is thought that this is legislation that is imperative to make the railway a success and is needed even during the construction period. It may well be termed a companion bill to the Alaskan railway bill just passed. It is needed in Alaska now. The Territory has been tied up for eight years as tight as a drum. This will open Alaska; this will dovetail in with the railway bill just passed.

We submit this bill to the House as our combined judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated that some of this coal would be located adjacent to the railroads, and have better railroad facilities than other coals would have; that some would have advantages and some disadvantages upon that account?

Mr. FERRIS. That was my thought.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe that, in the face of the fact we have already reached the millennium and are going to build railroads into these coal fields and develop them, any such condition can possibly arise?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, the gentleman and I in the past have been in agreement about Government-built railroads, and we thought that we had the best views on the subject, but both myself and the gentlemen were rolled very flat in respect to our views.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman grant me one question?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in the bill you prescribe as to rentals not less than 25 cents per acre for the first year, and you place no limitation on the stated rentals for the following years.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman is mistaken, and that that is provided for.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, 50 cents is provided for the second, third, and fourth years, respectively, and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease; but it is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to charge less or more than those amounts?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that the bill covers that. The gentleman will notice that these requirements are made to insure development, and that if the lease goes on and development accrues, the royalties accruing thus offset the rental charges referred to by the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I simply desired to call attention to the fact that the language on page 7 is ambiguous, and when I read the bill the other night I had difficulty in determining whether the committee intended an absolute charge of 50 cents per acre for rental or $1 after the fifth year, or whether it was to be not less than those amounts.

Mr. FERRIS. I think probably the gentleman may be right about that, but we can reach that subject under the five-minute rule when the bill is read for amendments. The gentleman probably is correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, I am not informed as to coal royalties, but is this 2 cents per ton royalty just about a nominal sum or——

Mr. FERRIS. The purpose in mind was to fix 2 cents as a minimum for the inaccessible areas. The Secretary then offers it at competitive bid and gets all it will stand. Certain fields will not bear much royalty, while others will. The bill is intended, through appraisement and the competitive feature combined, to do justice in all cases. This affords a double chance to protect the public interest. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma consumed 50 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill should pass. [Applause.] I sincerely hope it may be very materially amended, but in any event it is imperative that we legislate touching the coal situation in Alaska. We have waited so long, conditions have become so unbearable, that we might better now legislate somewhat unwisely than not to legislate at all. I shall do the best I can and with perfect good nature and sincerity to modify quite a number of the provisions of the bill. It is my expectation to vote for it, even though it shall, when we finally get through with it, be but little better than it is now. But it is not a very good piece of legislation as it stands. I agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma, the chairman of the committee, that the committee has labored diligently and earnestly to secure wise legislation on this subject. The committee was somewhat handicapped in this matter, as it has been in other matters of late, under the new policy we have adopted under the flag—and I say this with all due deference to the gentleman from Oklahoma, because no one is better qualified to draw bills than himself—but no longer does Congress draw bills and in committee carefully consider them. No longer is our legislation the product of the Congress. It is primarily the product of some clerk in the office of an assistant secretary or an assistant bureau chief. It may be changed more or less along the line as it passes through the bureau and department, but it generally comes out with about the slant that the clerk gives who first guesses it out. Then it comes to the committee, and it matters not how well qualified the committee may be, it may be that the committee is by a considerable majority opposed to the form and draft and general character of the legislation; yet the bill, having been cast, having been drafted, it is almost impossible, unless you take it at the grass roots and pull it up and start with something new it is almost impossible to get a piece of legislation such as it should be. Our committees do the best they can, I am sure, under these conditions.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a minute. They do the best they can with this material furnished them under the new dispensation by the departments. We have to support it, though we may not like its provisions, if that is the best we can get. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he is sure that all of these bills have been drawn by some department head or chief? The record discloses, so far as the currency bill was concerned, the bill was drawn by H. Parker Willis, of Wall Street, and that this Congress has paid him $4,814.50 for his services, and I want to ask the gentleman if he has any assurance that there will not be other bills which will come to Congress from the heads of departments with such bills for drafting?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Iowa has referred to another phase of the new dispensation. When I said the bills were drafted in the department or by the departments or handed to the committees by the department I did not mean that in every case the department officials drew the bill. Discussing this very Glass currency bill, I said some one had been impolite and unkind enough to inquire who wrote it, and I said that it occurred to me that that was not so important an interrogatory as this: Who furnished the receptive ear to influences, with personal aims and purposes to serve, and upon the suggestions thus filtering in from Wall Street and other interested points, finally agreed upon the form of legislation? The gentleman from Iowa has done very valuable service in digging down into the files to discover that we have actually paid the bill. If the editor of the Wall Street Journal wrote the currency bill—and the fact of the payment would seem to be conclusive of that fact—he ought to have been paid for it, and I am glad the bill has been paid, in spite of Democratic economy. The sum the gentleman from Iowa mentions, however, is a large sum for the kind of a job that was done.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. If we have been relieved from the necessity of drawing the bills, has anyone volunteered to relieve us from the burden of paying them?

Mr. MONDELL. Paying the bills? The people pay the bills. Sometimes it takes the people some time to discover just how they pay the bills and just what the burdens are that the bills place upon them. It may take some time under the bill just referred to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Did not the gentleman from Wyoming vote for that bill, and did not the majority of the gentlemen on that side vote for the currency bill?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman can not shake his gory locks at me. I did not vote for it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the RECORD disclose that the majority of the Republicans of this House voted for it, and nearly all the Progressives?

Mr. MONDELL. Some voted for it on the theory that the Republican Party had promised legislation on the subject, and that the fathers fortunately had provided two branches of the Congress, and before Congress got through they thought we might get some tolerable legislation. I do not believe anyone voted for it on either side because they really thought it was a first-class piece of legislation. If anyone did vote for the Glass currency bill when it passed the House with the idea that it was perfect legislation, with what great regret he must have voted for the bill finally, which, after it had passed through the Senate and the conference, was as unlike the bill that you passed here as one can well imagine.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask whether or not that bill which passed early in December last year is yet in full operation?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no. Large bodies move slowly, and some day——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. And some day it is to be hoped——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not want him to yield. I want to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The rule requires that whoever addresses this House should talk to the subject matter. Now, this is trifling with the rules. An intelligent Member and one who is as accustomed to the floor as the gentleman is should not transgress the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. It does not matter whether the Glass currency bill is in operation or not. There is still a God in Israel and there is still good Republican currency legislation on the statute books. What matter whether the new currency bill is put into full operation or not? A great emergency arose, and although eight months had passed since the Glass bill became a law no one, the Democratic administration least of all, looked to that bill to help the situation or save the business of the country; on the contrary, the administration turned to the Republican Vreeland-Aldrich currency bill, which you gentlemen so violently denounced at the time of its passage, and through the provisions of that Republican act the emergency, caused by the greatest war in history, was met.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not proceeding out of order or in violation of the rules of the House. If he should do so, the Chair will call him down. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER]?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BOOHER. I wanted to ask if the gentleman thought the God in Israel has been looking at the Republican Party very much lately?

Mr. MONDELL. Whom the Lord loveth he sometimes chasteneth. We have have been chastened, and I think we have benefited somewhat by the chastening, as we will show the gentleman in the ides of November. Now, Mr. Chairman, to come to this Alaskan bill; it should be passed, and I am going to vote for it even if it is not any better when we get through than it is now; but I hope it will be.

Mr. MADDEN. I am glad to see the gentleman so enthusiastic in supporting the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want to be misunderstood. We must legislate on this subject, and we must legislate the best we can. This bill is not, in my opinion, the kind of legislation we should have to meet the situation, but, good or bad, the situation must be met. I introduced an Alaskan coal-leasing bill, or presented it to the House, three years ago last February; and I say, without any desire to be egotistical, that it was a very much better bill than the one we are now considering [applause on the Republican side]; that it was a more workable bill, and that it protected the rights of the public in every possible way much better than this bill does.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. BORCHERS. I understood you to say it was three years ago in February.

Mr. MONDELL. It was three years ago in February, I think, when it was taken up.

Mr. BORCHERS. And you had a Republican President and a Republican Congress at that time, did you not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; we did. But we had an unfortunate condition in this country. We had a Secretary of the Interior of whom some people did not approve and in whom some people did not have full confidence. In view of that fact, the committee in drawing the bill was very careful to lay down all of the requirements that would have to be met under the lease and to leave practically nothing to the discretion of the Secretary. And yet the bill was defeated largely on the ground that it left too much to the discretion of the Secretary. As a matter of fact, it left scarcely anything to his discretion. I desire to say, however, I have no doubt but that that bill would have passed could we have had the time for its consideration which is given to this bill; but a limited debate and no opportunity for amendment under suspension of the rules requiring a two-thirds vote defeated it.

How times do change! To-day we have before us a bill which will pass, and which turns over to the Secretary of the Interior all the coal fields of Alaska to do with as he pleases. Within a few general limitations, the Secretary may grant or withhold. He may prevent anyone from securing a lease, and he may lease the maximum quantity to any favorite and under practically any conditions. If we had presented such a bill as this at the time the former bill was brought before the House there would have been a riot. And yet, while times may change, principles ought not to change. The last Democratic platform made a very proper declaration that this is a Government of law and not of men, and it criticized the Republican Party because it was claimed that we were departing from the principle that this is a Government of law and that we were attempting to make it a Government of men. Great heavens, if the man who wrote that statement and declaration could read this law he would never believe that it was written by men who had subscribed to that platform!

And that is the principal objection to the bill. It places altogether too much power and authority in the hands of one man.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. The Secretary of the Interior is an honest man, and a well-meaning man, but he is not omnipotent, omniscient, or omnipresent. If he were the wisest man that ever lived, he could not look after every detail of the great work to be carried out under this bill. And, however wise, and honest, and honorable, and well intentioned he may be, he may not be Secretary of the Interior in a month from now, though we hope he will. He certainly could not continue to be for any great number of years under the practice of our Government.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I wanted to inquire of the gentleman if we did not recently, almost within a fortnight ago, turn over to the Secretary of the Interior the disposition of the water powers in this country as well?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we gave this same Secretary more control over the public lands in the West that may be utilized for water-power purposes than was ever, in my opinion, placed in the hands of one man by any Government on the face of the earth.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. That is what I think, too.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a pretty strong statement, but I believe it to be absolutely true; and we are the only Government in the world that has ever gone into the leasing business without prescribing in the law the conditions of the lease. They do that in New Zealand. They do it in the various States of the Commonwealth of Australia. They do that in the Provinces of Canada. We, adopting these foreign methods of utilizing coal, these methods recently adopted in foreign lands, lay down only a few general rules for the guidance of the Secretary and leave all else to his discretion.

I hope it will never occur that great wrong shall be done under this bill, that great scandals shall arise by reason of its operation. I hope not. I have great confidence in the officials of my Government; but I know, and every other man who knows anything about the bill knows, that it affords great opportunity for favoritism, for dishonesty, and for scandal, with all the lasting harm to the public interest which would follow from that sort of thing.

Now, that is the first trouble with the bill. It is so fundamental that it affects every feature of it, every paragraph in it. It has an effect not only on the legal aspect of the bill, but on its practical workings as well. For instance, there are two general ways in which you might lease coal lands. You might say to those who are qualified to lease, "Go upon the lands to be leased and select such area, within the prescribed limit, as you believe to be sufficient and so located and situated so as to make a mine profitable." Or we may say, as we do in this bill, "We will divide this great coal field, laid down originally in successive layers on some great plain or at the bottom of some swamp or lake, then through millions of years tossed and rolled until no acre of the various veins of coal lies in its natural position; we will go into a field like that, lay it off like a checkerboard into 40-acre tracts, and have some clerk who never saw a coal mine take a certain number of those 40-acre tracts and say, 'This one is a mine site; this area is a leasehold.'" Can we expect to secure profitable and practical operations in that way. In my opinion, the plan, if it works at all, will lead to very great waste, and will cost the people who use the coal a very great deal of money.

I have had some experience in opening coal mines. In my early youth I prospected and developed and opened some coal properties. I know how difficult it is, even where coal is not badly tossed and rolled and folded, to determine where you should attack a vein and what territory you should have behind it to suffice for a large working mine; and I know how utterly impossible it would be—at least, that is my opinion—to establish favorable mining operations under the plan which this bill seems to propose—a plan under which no consideration is apparently to be given as to the topography of the country, the location of the tap lines of railway, the ground needed for storage and loading tracks, the proper place for an opening in order to attack the vein to the best advantage and secure as far as possible the aid of gravity in bringing the coal to the surface; the question of how the vein dips from the opening and how much area accessible to the opening it is necessary to control in order to secure a mine that will have a reasonable lease of life. Ignoring all of these things, we propose, apparently, to carve these two coal fields of Alaska as you might slice gingerbread, and, without regard to the topography, thickness of the vein or dip, opportunities to attack, places for loading and storage tracks, to say, "If you want to mine coal in Alaska, you must mine from this area that we have selected for you, without regard to the natural conditions."

If, under a bill of this kind, opportunities are given to open the coal fields of Alaska to the best advantage and in a way to give the people the cheapest coal, it will be a pure "happen chance," and it will be because a plan apparently fatal to economical and successful working may by some good chance or providence work out better than we believe it can. The lessee should have an opportunity to go into the field and select, after careful and painstaking study, the area which he desires and believes he can work successfully. If there are overlapping claims or applications, the Secretary should have authority to decide, under proper rules, between them.

Now, the bill proposes not only that the leases shall be made in this way, but it proposes to reserve for the United States a considerable area of the lands in each field. I realize that it is not popular to talk against reservations, and gentlemen say, "Why, he who argues against reservations by the Government in the interest of the people can not be the friend of the people." Well, if reservations of this kind were in the general interest or in the public interest I should certainly favor them. But this is the situation in Alaska: For the present there are two fields, the Matanuska field and the Bering field, that are likely to be worked in a large way. For the present, and until the country shall have been developed more, there are not many points where those fields can be successfully attacked and mines opened.

If I were the Secretary of the Interior, under this bill I would feel it to be my duty to reserve the front and most accessible portions of these two fields. If I did anything else I would feel that I was subjecting myself to proper criticism. Well, if the Secretary does that, what does it mean? It means that the lands to be leased will be lands that are difficult of approach, or lands where the coal is badly broken, or lands where there are not favorable opportunities for loading and transportation. The result will be that the cost of mining will be increased, and the increased cost of mining, no matter how you may attempt to divert it, will finally fall upon the man who buys the coal. If we are working in the interest of the purchasers of this coal, it is our duty to give the best opportunities for opening the coal; and if we do reserve the best areas, these frontal areas, and compel the lessees to build their tracks around them or go to the less favored localities and to hold them, what do we propose to do with them?

There is only one valid reason for a Government coal-leasing system. The only possible excuse for a governmental leasing system lies in the fact that it is hoped, and by some expected, that we may thus prevent possible combinations, and thus may be able to insure the user of coal cheaper coal than he might have under a system of private ownership. That being the only sound reason or excuse for a leasing system, it is our duty to put in the law provisions that will, so far as is humanly possible, accomplish those purposes. And those purposes being accomplished, why does the Government want to withhold from use the very areas that can be used to the best advantage and furnish the cheapest coal? Does anybody believe that the Government or the people collectively can sometimes mine coal cheaper than private enterprise? Anyone who has that view can not have had much experience with this class of business or much experience with Government ownership generally. As we propose to control all of these areas under leases, we are to a certain extent defeating the very purposes of our legislation when we propose to withhold the best and the most available part from use. And if the Secretary does not withhold the best and most available part, he will be seriously criticized. We are in fact reserving all these lands for use. Why reserve some of the best portions from use? If it is the inaccessible tracts that the Secretary is to reserve, the provision is not necessary; they are reserved by their position until the more accessible lands are worked out.

The bill I have referred to contained a provision which authorized the President to take coal mined from any of these areas wherever he found it, whenever needed for the Army, the Navy, or the Revenue-Cutter Service, at a reasonable price to be fixed by him. The object of that was twofold. First, to obviate the necessity, if any necessity there ever was, for reservations, on the theory that we might need to mine coal for our Army or Navy, a theory that never had much foundation in logic.

Second, it fixed a method under which the Government could from time to time establish what was a fair price for coal under the conditions of delivery under which the Government received its coal. With a provision like that in the bill, there would not be the slightest reason or excuse for any reservation, providing you also have in the bill adequate provisions to protect against unfair prices, monopoly, and restraint of trade, which, unfortunately, the bill does not at this present time contain. That is another peculiarity of this legislation. There was complaint of the bill of three years ago by some that its provisions were so drastic that no one could operate under it; by others that it did not sufficiently guard the public interest. But its provisions guarding the public interest were infinitely clearer and more definite and more all-embracing than the provisions of this bill. And, furthermore, they were provisions which were made effective in two ways: First, by being made a part of the law and enforceable as a statute. In addition, they were made part of the contract of lease, so that there was no getting away from those provisions.

Now, this bill not only lacks provisions protecting the public, but only one of the few that it has is in the nature of a statutory prohibition. Some of the others are simply referred to as matters that the Secretary may include in his contract if he sees fit.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-five gentlemen present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Browning	Covington	Fairchild
Aiken	Byrnes, S. C.	Crisp	Falson
Aney	Calder	Dies	Farr

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in Alaska, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, the Chair had directed the roll to be called, and 308 Members answered to ther names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the roll call I was calling attention to the fact that this bill does not safeguard the public interest and the rights of the consumer as well as did the bill which I had the honor of reporting to the House three years ago. There is but one statutory provision in the act in the way of prohibition of practices which would be harmful to the consumer. That is contained in section 6; it is to the effect that the lessee shall not enter into any agreement, arrangement, or other device to enhance the price of coal. It does not in any way strengthen the present provisions of the law. The most that can be said for it is that it states the present antitrust statutes and no more. Further than that, the Secretary is authorized to include in leases all sorts of conditions—exercise of reasonable diligence, care, and skill in the operation of the property, rules for the safety of miners, and so forth, and such other provisions as he may deem necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States and for the safeguarding of the public welfare. The trouble with that is that it is so wholly indefinite that the Secretary would either include too much or too little in his lease, and it leaves the Secretary with full power and authority to prohibit certain acts and certain practices in one lease and to make no reference whatever to them in another. In other words, the Congress lays down no definite rules for guidance of the Secretary, and does not by law prohibit practices that ought to be prohibited in mining and selling the coal in Alaska.

I want as a matter of comparison to call the attention of Members to the provisions contained in the bill to which I have referred, which were made a part of the lease binding upon all lessees:

> That all leases issued under the provisions of this act shall be upon the condition that the lessee shall proceed with due diligence to open a coal mine or mines on the leased premises and to produce coal therefrom during the life of the lease in such quantity as the condition of the market shall justify. That he shall not monopolize, in whole or in part, the trade in coal. That he will at all times sell the coal extracted from the leased premises at just, fair, and reasonable rates, without the giving of rebates or drawbacks, and without discrimination in price or otherwise, as between persons or places for a like product delivered under similar terms and conditions. That the mining operations shall be carried on in a workmanlike manner with due regard to the permanence of the mine, without undue waste, and with especial reference to the safety and welfare of the miners.

All of these things necessary for the care of the mine, for the continuous prosecution of the work of mining, for the protection of the consumer against extortion and the miner against accident, were carried in the bill to which I have referred as provisions of the statute law and a part of the contract. There were, of course, the proper provisions for enforcement and for the cancellation of the lease in case any of its conditions were violated.

Some gentlemen opposed that bill on the claim that it did not sufficiently safeguard the public interest. It safeguarded the public interest in every respect, and far more than this bill does, as I have indicated by the comparison I have made.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], in answer to a question a moment ago, said that the committee had after due deliberation left out of the bill provisions that have been suggested under which the selling price of coal could be fixed. In answer to an interrogatory a moment later he said that under the broad powers given to the Secretary he could fix the selling price.

Now, what is it Congress proposes to do and what is our judgment in regard to that important matter? We certainly ought to have an opinion about it one way or the other. We should not leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to decide. The gentleman says that the committee left it out of the bill because the committee did not think it wise to put it in the bill, and yet they say the Secretary of the Interior may fix the price at which the coal shall be sold. I do not know whether he will or not. No one knows. He may in one case and he may not in another. There is nothing in the bill to prohibit him from varying these conditions as he sees fit. As a matter of fact, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said a moment ago, any provision in the bill or in the lease which attempted to fix definitely in advance the price at which coal should be sold would defeat the purposes of the bill, for no one could afford to go into the coal-mining business under those conditions; certainly not until the price of mining in Alaska is determined.

It is important that the antitrust statutes should be so strengthened by the provisions in the lease as to make it clear and certain at all times that the coal shall be sold at a reasonable price, without discrimination as between persons and places, and that the consumer should be protected. If we are not going to do this, there is no excuse for a Federal coal leasing. It would be better that the Government be saved the trouble and expense of attempting to handle these leases, turn the property over at a fair price to private parties, if by a system of leasing we do not strengthen the control of the community over the manner in which the coal shall be mined and the manner in which the consumer shall be treated. There is no other excuse that I know of for the Government going into this somewhat questionable business of leasing coal mines.

I said I was going to vote for this bill, and I am, hoping that some of its defects will be cured; but whether they are or not, the people of Alaska, as I understand, are prepared to accept the bill, not that the majority of them like its provisions, but because they have waited so long for the development of the resources of their Territory that they are willing to accept anything that Congress sees fit to do. But there are certain people up there who are still entitled to some consideration by the Congress of the United States. We can not afford to do an unfair or an inequitable or an unjust thing, even though we are dealing with coal properties around which the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy raged. There are good, straight, honest American citizens who have, they say, legitimate claims to some coal lands in Alaska. The bill which I introduced, and to which I have referred, provided that nothing contained in the bill should affect their rights one way or the other, but left it to the Government to decide what their rights were. The Interior Department under its general authority can in 30 days determine as to the rights of all these claimants, can close them all out, if it feels justified in doing so, and then leave the way clear for the leasing of the property. But this bill, ignoring entirely the claims of these Alaskan coal claimants, proposes to put the Government in a position where it shall use its forces of inertia to deprive them of whatever rights they have, because it provides in the latter part of section 3 that the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act, for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property, shall be deemed the possession of the United States. We can not, of course, determine these claims and the rights of these claimants. But we propose to hold them up indefinitely by leasing their lands or leasing the lands they claim, and then preventing them from getting into court or securing a determination of their rights by saying that the lessee under this law shall be held to be in possession for and on behalf of the United States, and therefore there is no way in which his rights and title can be determined.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I was going to ask the gentleman if he knows whether or not any of these claims, where there is a contest, has been decided since the 4th of March, 1913?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know. My understanding is that none has been decided since then. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not. I have asked for that information, and I have not received it.

Mr. MONDELL. I think prior to that time there were adverse decisions in some few cases, and I think it is possible there may have been some adverse decisions since, but there has been no recent decision, one way or the other, in those cases where the claimant is actively pressing his claim and demanding a decision. This matter has been held open, and now the Congress coolly proposes to say to these claimants that the Secretary of the Interior, having refused to pass on their claims to determine whether they have any rights or not, may lease the land claimed, and lease it in such a way that no one can attack the right of the lessee. I do not believe we can afford to do that. I have no special interest in the affairs of any of these Alaskan coal claimants. I know but one of them personally, a man who was a universally respected citizen in my State for many years, a man I never heard anything against except the fact that he was active as a Democrat in politics. He made some money in Wyoming through years of earnest effort and went out to Alaska and took a coal claim. He put all of the money that he had in the world, I am told, into it. It was quite a few thousand dollars. It left him, I believe, entirely without resources, and he is no longer young. I think his coal claim is as clean as a hound's tooth. I have never talked with any one who had any different view with regard to the coal claim of my friend McDonald, and yet I think under this bill the McDonald claim could be leased, and I do not think that McDonald could in any way raise the question of his rights.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, I do not believe the gentleman is quite fair about that.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to say to my friend that I want to be entirely fair. If that provision of the bill is not to be interpreted as I interpret it, I shall be very glad to hear that it is subject to some different and more favorable interpretation.

Mr. FERRIS. Let the gentleman read the last section on page 11, and read the proviso, which is as follows:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof.

The committee does not want to take away a single right that any man has, neither does the committee want to give him any additional right. If the Mr. McDonald, the gentleman referred to, has, and I am informed that he has, a lot of claims that, using the gentleman's term, are as clean as a hound's tooth, then I will say that you have a western Secretary, you have a western Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I believe that man will get his patent, as he ought to, if he is entitled to it.

Mr. MONDELL. We have a western Secretary and a western commissioner, but we have an unfortunate public sentiment with regard to Alaskan coal lands. Some day some man may come forward who is brave enough to do what is right in these matters. I hope we have such men now in the Government service. The fact remains, however, that if these cases are not decided the tracts can be leased there under the provision I have referred to, and the claimant barred from asserting his right.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is my understanding that the McDonald lease has been up to the Secretary for several weeks; in fact, for two or three months, and the thing that amazes me is why there are not some decisions in these cases. What is the purpose of holding them up, if the gentleman knows? Why has not somebody the courage to do something in these coal cases?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of provisions in this bill that I do not particularly object to, applied to Alaska, which I should not want to see applied to the States. The situation is somewhat different there, in some respects, from what it is in respect to public lands generally. I am not one of those who would experiment with the people who are trying to develop the resources of that far northwestern Territory. Still there are some things that may be proper to do in coal-leasing legislation affecting Alaska that we ought not to do elsewhere on the public domain. One of them is the limitation of interests in leases, the provision under which no one person can have an interest in more than one lease.

That was a provision of the bill to which I have referred which I introduced and reported and, I think, it is very properly a provision in this bill; but I hope it will not be taken as a precedent for like action when we come to the general coal-leasing bill applicable to the continental territory of the United States. Even in Alaska that provision is not so important as one reading the bill would conclude it was, in the judgment of the committee. They have used several pages, quite a number of sections of the bill, and multiplying punishments against those who might, directly or indirectly, have an interest in more than one lease. It is proper that provision should be in the bill, possibly proper that those prohibitions should all of them be in the bill; but it is strange that the committee, feeling it necessary to prevent joint ownerships, should not have fully realized the still greater importance of preventing monopoly—monopoly that might be established through independent holdings, the importance of prohibiting improper practice in the sale of the coal. There are quite a number of the provisions of the bill entirely proper in their general purpose that ought to be amended quite radically. The system under which it is proposed to lease is a new and novel one to me. I do not pretend to say how it will work in Alaska. I do not believe it would work well in my State, with its vast coal areas, and in Montana and throughout the West—a system or a plan under which the Secretary is to fix certain conditions and minimum royalties and then advertise for bids on the basis of the acceptance of those conditions and the offer of bonuses in the way of such higher royalties and rents as the bidder may feel justified in making. Put into operation in our continental territory that would mean that in a short time all our coal operations would be in the hands of very large corporations, men who knew just how to make bids under those circumstances, men who could promise and offer to do things material or immaterial, wise or unwise, necessary or unnecessary, which others could not afford to do, thus widening the opportunity for favoritism. If we try this system in Alaska, I hope we will not try it anywhere else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS].

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, this side has kindly yielded me 20 minutes and the other side 20 minutes, making 40 minutes, with the understanding that I am to make a speech on the cotton situation, and under the rules perhaps I could not do that. I therefore ask unanimous consent to proceed for 40 minutes to make a talk on cotton.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for 40 minutes on a discussion of the cotton situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, the theory that prosperity, general and permanent, can be produced by legislation on any subject is a startling doctrine, not worthy of consideration for a moment by any sincere, thoughtful, well-informed man. That centuries ago was the dogma of despotism; it was the doctrine of the divine right of kings that "we make our children happy and prosperous." It has no place in any true economic theory of development of any country, and especially when under such a Constitution and in such a condition as ours.

It may be granted fairly that legislation may promote prosperity, but it never can produce it; and the very gentlemen who now so strenuously talk it 10 years ago were the very men that sounded the bugle note all over this Republic on the money question that you can not make value by law; that you can not create prosperity by legislating an increase in the volume of money regardless of intrinsic value. I was one, though a Democrat, who agreed with that proposition; and I abide in the faith still, and it is as applicable to the tariff as it is to any other phase of legislation. You can not produce prosperity by law any more than you can produce dogs and cats by law. It does not come in that way. It is a great natural, universal process through which prosperity comes. It does not come down from the Government to the people. It does not come from the hands of kings, or courts, or legislatures, or parliaments. No; it comes by the blessing of God in soil, in season, and the industry and intelligence of mankind combined. In this country, peculiarly, prosperity is a great hybrid born of the gift of God in soil and season and of the energy, the industry, the tireless will, and intelligence of the American citizens, the greatest the world has ever known, and especially those who till the soil and work the mines and attend the ranches of the country. Prosperity, my countrymen, is a natural product born of conditions which can not be produced by any party or government that exists, that has ever existed, or that ever will exist.

"You may by legislation divert from its general, universal, and wide avenues part of the prosperity, channelize it and localize it and benefit an individual, a class, or a section. You can do that by protection, as you can by various other forms of legislation, but you can not produce a general, universal, and permanent prosperity by protection or by any other sort of legislation.

"Let us trace the source and progress of prosperity. Other countries have not sufficient products of their own to feed and clothe their people, and there is in foreign markets a demand for cotton, wheat, and meat. Our cotton, wheat, and stock raisers have produced a great excess above home consumption. What happens then? So much is produced as that not only 80,000,000 inhabitants of the United States are supplied, but an immenes surplus is borne down the lines of railway to the sea, and into the holds of the vessels of the world, and by them carried into the markets of the world under the banner, if you please, of absolute free trade and in competition in the markets of the world with all these products.

"In turn for these products the gold of Europe is poured in a great tide back into American homes. Then what happens? There is an increased capacity to buy on the part of those engaged in the production of these great products, and wherever there exists such an increased capacity on the part of the people to satisfy their needs or their desires more purchases occur. This people thus blessed by soil and season and their intelligent industry go about in the stores of the land and buy the various things they need to satisfy their wants or desires—aye, their fancies and whims—and retail trade, closest to and most dependent upon the people, rapidly responds to this birth of prosperity.

"The retail dealers begin to buy through drummers and by letters of the wholesale houses. Wholesale houses, realizing the impetus to their trade, make larger drafts upon the manufacturer, and the manufacturer gets a move on him; the smoke begins to rush faster and higher out of the factory chimneys, and the railroads get busy, and all along the pathway thus described, from the field to the foreign market, back again, and from the home people to the manufacturer and back again, labor everywhere gets increased employment, and an added capacity to buy, predicated upon the original capacity to buy, occurs. And thus in an endless chain in God's ordained way prosperity rolls on unfettered and blesses the American people regardless of whether the President is named Grover Cleveland or William McKinley."

"Prosperity comes to our country in no other way than this natural way, which augments the national wealth by the products of the soil. God made this country to feed the world, and keyed its potent forces upon its fertile soil and favorable climate.

"The American farmer, who plants in faith, cultivates in hope, and reaps in grace, is the uncrowned king of the world. Long may he reign, unfettered, to pour out his products into the markets of the world, to bless foreign nations, and to enrich his own.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

"But I have said this doctrine is pernicious in its teachings. First, it teaches an idea that is demoralizing and ruinous, the doctrine that men should look to law rather than to God and themselves for their industrial success. It teaches men of all classes to rush to the Government for every ill that afflicts them.

"Under normal conditions, applicable to all trade everywhere, under all conditions, if unaffected by other laws, let me say to you that it is an economic principle, as true in trade as is the law of gravitation, that the price of a product in the furthest market in which an appreciable quantity of it is sold, less the cost and commission of selling it there, fixes the price of the product in all intervening markets and in the field of production as well. The housewives in the country long ago found out that if the hens get busy and lay more eggs in Indiana than the local markets can take care of, and they are shipped to Chicago and New York and other great cities, then the city price, less the cost of shipping the goods there and the commission of the wholesaler and the retailer, fixes the price of every egg laid in Indiana, and the hen nor anybody else can not get away from that law.

"Every wheat raiser, every cotton raiser, every cattle raiser, whether he comprehends the philosophy of the law or not, has felt it in its operation and bowed to its inexorable logic."

All these extracts are from a speech that I delivered on the floor of this House on June 27, 1906, and I have read them now for the express purpose of calling the attention of my Democratic colleagues to the fundamental principles that I then announced. I believed they were profoundly true in 1906, and I abide in that faith still. They are changeless, immutable, sound principles, and apply to the tariff no less than to any other governmental question.

We of the South especially have been urging them for a hundred years. We of the South especially believe they were applicable to the doctrine of protection, against which we stood, and I submit that they are no less true now.

Let us face this cotton situation fairly. Let us look the situation squarely in the face. In round numbers, this country produces 14,000,000 bales of cotton of 500 pounds each. Eight million bales are exported to foreign countries and 6,000,000 bales are consumed at home. Texas is more interested in this cotton situation than any other State, for it produces 4,500,000 bales, and the district that has so honored me produces about 350,000 bales, and the crop matures earlier there than in any other cotton section. Cotton is king with us. It is our chief money crop. We have no factories, but are strictly an agricultural and stock-raising community.

Now, this deplorable and indefensible war which has broken out in Europe involves three of our chief buyers of our foreign export cotton—England, which takes three and one-half million bales; Germany, which takes two and one-third million bales; and France, which takes over a million bales. Naturally the war has suspended the cotton market, so that the American cotton raiser has been "fettered" by this war, which has temporarily destroyed nearly two-thirds of his market, and will affect it to a large extent for this year's crop and maybe next year's crop.

I have received telegrams and letters galore, making wise and unwise suggestions, and all more or less appealing to me for governmental help. Now, I want to say this is no time for the demagogue or the selfish speculator; for the man who would prey on the ignorance of the people, either politically for office or financially for profit. It is a time when all thoughtful, level-headed men must stand together, cooperate with each other, and bear one another's burdens.

As a sample of the many letters and telegrams that I have received, I will have read a letter from Judge W. S. Holman, of Bay City, Matagorda County, Tex. He is a dear friend of mine, and a level-headed fellow. His father has recently died in Fayette County. He was a farmer, and left a large cotton crop on the farm. I read:

BAY CITY, TEX., August 19, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE F. BURGESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GEORGE: I have written recently several letters to cotton factors in Houston and Galveston for the purpose of arranging to take care of the cotton crop on my father's farm in Fayette County.

Inclosed I hand you a copy of a letter which I have received from William Christian, of Houston, Tex. This is just like all the balance. The reason I send this to you is because I have received it last. There must be some arrangement made by which the Treasury of the United States will assist in financing the cotton crop. The situation is worse than you possibly can understand, and is appalling to us, who have always thought that cotton will bring money when nothing else will. Now is the time for constructive statemanship. It will not be the part of a demagogue to go carefully into this matter. I am sending you this in order to advise you of the situation.

Very truly, your friend,
W. S. HOLMAN.

The letter to which he referred I also desire to read:

HOUSTON, August 18, 1914.

W. S. HOLMAN, Bay City, Tex.

DEAR SIR: I have your esteemed favor of the 14th and beg to advise that the late European war has perfectly paralyzed the cotton market, causing the closing of all the exchanges throughout the world. It has also placed an embargo upon commerce cutting off all outlets for cotton. Hence as cotton has no basic value and there is no market for it at present, no one can tell how much to advance. Furthermore, exporters and buyers can not get any money from the banks, as they can not realize on the cotton either by cash or exchange. In my 40 years' experience I have never witnessed such a time as this, when you could not borrow money on cotton, stocks, or bonds. I have a great deal of cotton upon which I have mortgages, and I am compelled to help the parties who have pledged their cotton to me to enable them to pick and pack their cotton and market it, making them a reasonable advance on the same to meet their pressing necessities. As this will take all the money I can demand, I have concluded not to take outside business until a market can be established for cotton and an outlet opened, because it will simply lock up money and make the money market harder and harder, which will ultimately so stagnate things that they could not get money to move the cotton after normal conditions were restored. I must say that the hardest problem to solve that I have ever found—how this crop is going to be successfully moved until commerce is resumed and the markets are well opened. Our domestic spinners consume only one-third of our cotton at their fullest capacity, which leaves two-thirds as a burden upon the market and absorption of inactive property. If this war continues long, it will be difficult to predict the disastrous results it will cause. The only policy I see now to adopt is to gather the crop, ship it to a point where it can be placed under storage and insurance and abide the time until a market can be had.

I thank you very much for remembering me and regret exceedingly that the conditions are such that will not warrant me in assisting you.

Believe me to be, with high esteem,
Yours, truly,
W. CHRISTIAN.

On August 24 I replied to Judge Holman's letter as follows:

AUGUST 24, 1914.

Judge W. S. HOLMAN, Bay City, Tex.

MY DEAR WILL: I have received your letter of August 19, and hasten to reply.

I am thinking about the war and its effect on my district, my State, and my country. You bet it is a serious situation.

The letter from Mr. W. Christian is a common-sense document.

He says: "In my 40 years' experience I have never witnessed such a time as this, when you could not borrow money on cotton, stocks, or bonds." Further along in the letter to you he says: "The only policy I see now to adopt is to gather the crop, ship it to a point where it can be placed under storage and insurance, and bide the time until the market can be had." We are thinking and working all we can to relieve the situation, but I don't know, nor do I think anybody else does, how to legislate value when value don't exist. It can no more be done with reference to cotton than any other thing. You can't create value by law, and that is all there is to it, and it is the part of a demagogue to say you can.

We have passed in the Senate and have up now in the House the war-risk insurance bill, and I think we will authorize the President to buy ships. This is the only way to open the European markets and get our cotton to foreign ports. This is a time for sensible people everywhere to "sit steady in the boat," and the merchants and bankers ought to cooperate not with a view to making money. This is a time when everybody should stand together in order to save the country. I think myself it would be a fine idea for the merchants and the bankers and the farmers to meet together and discuss this question, with a view to holding what they have got and agreeing among themselves that no debt would be pressed for, say, three months. In that time, perhaps, the war will be over, or, if not, the reserve system will be organized, and we will have time to organize under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act and get money to run under and tide us over. It is folly talking about the National Government holding up the price of cotton. It can't do it, nor can anybody else. No legislation will do any good along this line. I suggest to you as best to try to make arrangements to hold the cotton crop raised on your father's farm. I know and sympathize to the fullest extent with the conditions that obtain in my district. I know they are worse than anywhere else on American soil. Our district raises over 300,000 bales of cotton, and it gathers the earliest of any cotton section. I know what this means, and I will do everything in my power for my people. I owe them that, and, besides, I want to do it, but I am not going to demagogue with them or anybody else.

We are to have a meeting to-day with the Secretary of the Treasury.

I remain,
Your friend,
GEO. F. BURGESS.

Now, there are some things that can not be done by any Government under the sun. No law that we could pass declaring everything white would change the color of a thing on earth. No law fixing a price would have any appreciable effect; and this is especially true of the price of cotton, because it is fixed by the European market. It is beyond the control of this Government, and Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, in his address before the cotton conference on the 25th instant, was emphatically correct when he said:

What you must do, gentlemen, is to consider this: That nobody can arbitrarily fix prices. The National Government can not do it. Let us get away from that; let us try to be practical. The States can not fix prices for one commodity or for all commodities and get away with it. The history of civilization shows that nations have been strewn with wrecks of that character. I need only to call your attention to the condtion of France in the French revolution, when similar things were attempted and resulted in the prostration of industry, credit, and everything in the land.

And in this connection I quote an editorial from the Goliad Advance, of Goliad, Tex., of August 19, 1914. This is from a little country paper edited by J. A. White, whom I know well as a level-headed, patriotic citizen. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENTAL AID FOR COTTON.

A time like the present, when the people of Texas, a great cotton-raising State, are greatly depressed over the falling cotton market, seems to us a poor one for the exhibition of demagogy such as has come to light in the expressions of some of our public men in Texas. The suggestion that the Government should come to the front and right off the bat establish a minimum price of 10 cents for cotton, and on that basis loan to the farmers $50 per bale at a low rate of interest, seems to us lacking in feasibility and loaded with all sorts of dangers. We would like to see the farmers get 15 or 20 cents for their cotton; but, as a matter of fact, we do not know that the staple is worth 10 cents a pound now, basing value on the law of supply and demand. The European war is a calamity the evil effect of which must be felt over the world. While ultimately it may bring great prosperity to the United States, it can not be gainsaid that it will in all probability leave the South with a surplus of a few million bales of cotton, and where there is a big surplus in prospect there has always been a corresponding falling off in price. In the face of such conditions it appears to us paternalism in the extreme to advocate a Government loan of $50 per bale for cotton that may be worth less than such amount. Such a precedent would lead to producers of different commodities clamoring for the protection of the Federal Treasury on every occasion where the market price should fall below the producers' estimate of value. Wheat, because of a surplus, might actually be worth 75 cents on the market, with the wheat farmer contending for $1. The wheat farmer would then have the same right to governmental aid as was claimed by the cotton farmer. And this could be followed up by every class of producer, until, if such a foolish policy were adopted, the Government would find itself confronted with the problem of purchasing all lines of commodities where the actual market values were not in accordance with the producer's idea of value. We believe all possible haste is being made in providing plans for extending to the banks Government aid in financing the cotton crop of the South, and we particularly believe our Texas Representatives in Congress are doing everything possible for the assistance of Texas farmers and business interests generally; but, so far as we have been able to judge, no serious thought has been given to the visionary proposition of Gov. Colquitt for a governmental standard of 10 cents a pound for cotton and a governmental loan of $50 per bale. That kind of talk seems to be the right kind of stuff on which to run for office in Texas just now, but no such foolish action will be taken, and such a suggestion in a time like this serves no good purpose.

Mr. BURGESS. Many respectable citizens have suggested to me the valorization of the cotton crop, after the manner of the valorization of the coffee crop. I know these people meant well, but it is idle to talk of such a thing in this country. In the first place, such a bill can not pass; and I am confident, if it could, it would prove worse than the evil that afflicts us.

I quote from Secretary McAdoo's address:

If you attempt to valorize—in the first place, it could not be done, because nobody can pass such a law; it is a perfectly wild and ridiculous expedient and should not be resorted to in any circumstances. When you seek to do that, what have we then? I received a telegram this morning from a man representing the canning industry, asking me to do something of the same sort and saying that if any valorization was going around they wanted to share in it. Of course they do, and ought to have it. If we are going to go into that, we shall have to valorize everything. You will have to valorize canned salmon, wheat, corn; you will have to valorize every single thing produced in this country, because, as I tell you, gentlemen, the shock of this great cataclysm in Europe has affected for the moment every line of industry.

Many have suggested a loan to the cotton farmers direct on their cotton, but this is not practicable. The Government has no machinery for doing that, and while I am in sympathy with the farmers and would help them any way I could, I am not going to demagogue with them. I am not going to lead them to believe that I can do something that I know I can not do.

I quote again from the address of Secretary McAdoo:

Now, is not this the simplification of the situation? The Government has no agencies, and it ought not to attempt to do this business. It is not the business of the Government to do this sort of thing—to make loans, to trace out the location and security of every bale of cotton behind one of these notes that is made the basis for this currency. The banks are the proper agencies. They are highly organized; they are in every part of the country, and so long as they are put in possession of the means of financing these things it is their business to finance them; and I know that they will be glad to finance them if they can get the resources; and all that these banks have got to do, all these associations have got to do, is to make application for currency under that act and comply with its provisions. I believe that if they will do that, acting always with prudence, acting with a very high degree of prudence and common, ordinary business judgment, that all the money that this country needs or ought to have for the financing and carrying of this cotton crop until it can be marketed and sold is largely in hand.

I have given some time and much thought to the money question. I loyally supported the banking and currency bill which has recently been passed. I thought it would prove a great benefit to the country, though at the time of its passage I had no idea of such a calamity befalling the country as the war in Europe, and which puts upon the banking and currency system the severest test that could possibly have occurred. I believe it will stand the strain.

I believe it is sufficient for the needs of the country, and I believe it will avert a panic, if everybody enters thoroughly into the carrying out of the system. In this connection I quote again from the Secretary of the Treasury:

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY M'ADOO.

Among the eligible securities to be used as a basis for the issue of currency I have decided to accept from national banks, through their respective national currency associations, notes secured by warehouse receipts for cotton or tobacco, and having not more than four months to run, at 75 per cent of their face value. The banks and the assets of all banks belonging to the currency association will be jointly and severally liable to the United States for the redemption of such additional circulation, and a lien will extend to and cover the assets of all banks belonging to the association and to the securities deposited by the banks with the association, pursuant to the provisions of law; but each bank composing such association will be liable only in proportion that its capital and surplus bear to the aggregate capital and surplus of all such banks.

This plan ought to enable the farmers to pick and market the cotton crop if the bankers, merchants, and cotton manufacturers will cooperate with each other and with the farmers and will avail of the relief offered by the Treasury within reasonable limits. Such cooperation is earnestly urged upon all these interests. The farmer can not expect as high a price for cotton this year because of the European war; yet he should not be forced to sacrifice his crop. The banker and the merchant should not exact excessive rates of interest, and the manufacturers should replenish their stocks as much as possible and pay reasonable prices for the product. If this is done, and it can be done if everyone displays a helpful spirit, a normal condition can be restored, and there ought to be no serious difficulty in taking care of the cotton problem.

Obviously, to my mind, the first thing to be done was to get our shipping going, because we must get to the foreign markets with our American products. This is why I supported the war-risk insurance bill as a war emergency measure. This is why, under certain conditions, I will support a similar proposition to purchase ships, because I will do everything that I can do to meet the situation.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Can the gentleman inform the committee what proportion of the cotton production of the United States is manufactured in this country?

Mr. BURGESS. About 6,000,000 bales.

Mr. HULINGS. That is about six-fifteenths?

Mr. BURGESS. About six-fourteenths.

I will have printed here a clipping from the Houston (Tex.) Post, an article entitled "A bank's advice to farmers," and also an editorial in the Houston Post of August 27, 1914, the common sense of which I commend to everybody:

A BANK'S ADVICE TO FARMERS.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX., August 8.

To Our Farmers:

On account of the war in Europe it is impossible to ship cotton abroad. All the cotton exchanges have closed and, for the time being, the only cotton moving is that being taken by American mills.

We would advise you to store your cotton in the local warehouse, bring your receipts to the bank, and if you need some extra funds we are perfectly willing to assist you; and also if necessary we will extend notes due us by farmers who are unable to meet them until they sell their cotton. We do not want you to sacrifice your cotton. The Corpus Christi National Bank wants to assist you in obtaining a fair price for it. In return we expect you to properly protect us by having your cotton under a good roof, protected from weather and fire. With this kind of collateral, you may rest easy, knowing that as soon as conditions adjust themselves you will be able to convert your crop into money at, we hope, a good price.

This is a time when the bankers, merchants, and farmers should all work together. If you owe your merchant and the bank, we suggest that you bring your cotton warehouse receipts to us, and, if you want to protect your merchants, you can give notice to the banks that upon sale of your cotton we are to make certain payments to the merchants. In this way you can deposit all your warehouse receipts in your bank and at the same time protect the merchant whom you owe. We think this is the proper thing for our farmers to do, and we feel sure that the merchants will be willing to extend all reasonable accommodations to those entitled to receive them.

Now that we have had some rain we urge all farmers to put their ground into a thorough state of cultivation. We hope you will put in a heavy acreage in feed, and also put in some live stock, especially hogs, which are very profitable in this country. The bank is willing to extend reasonable accommodation to farmers who will invest in good live stock.

CORPUS CHRISTI NATIONAL BANK.

THE BANKS AND THE FARMERS.

The Post is publishing elsewhere on this page a letter recently mailed by the Corpus Christi National Bank to the farmers of Nueces County, and the advice and suggestions contained therein are so sensible, considerate, broadminded, and patriotic that they are commended to all the country banks of Texas. The attitude assumed by the bank, it seems to The Post, is one that, if generally followed by the banks, would greatly mitigate the difficulties of handling the cotton crop.

The suggestion that bankers, merchants, and farmers cooperate is vital, of course, and cooperation means all working together for the mutual good of all, for if these three classes work together in the right spirit much loss will be averted and the welfare of the entire State conserved. The main point in the advice of the Corpus Christi bank is that of these three classes directly interested no two shall combine to the injury of the third. Equal and exact justice and consideration should be shown each class, for in the long run an injury to one is bound to prove disastrous to the other two.

The concluding paragraph of the letter is just as important as those preceding. It urges farmers to put their ground in a thorough state of cultivation, devoting a heavy acreage to forage crops and live stock, especially hogs. It offers reasonable accommodation to farmers who invest in good live stock.

This advice is applicable to every farmer in Texas, and always has been, but more so now than at any time in recent years. We know that the demand for meat must always be keen because the home demand is greater than the supply, and a foreign demand is inevitable just as soon as European conditions improve. Therefore, investments in live stock are certain to return profits, even during the period when it is certain that the cotton industry and the raw cotton market will be deranged.

So far as anybody can foresee events of world-wide concern, the war is going to be prolonged far beyond the period that was at first indicated. This will certainly necessitate a great curtailment of cotton production next year, and southern farmers will be compelled to devote their energies to other crops. Forage crops and live stock are more certain to produce profits than anything else, and it may be that cotton conditions will necessitate curtailment of production for several years to come.

So we see in the presence of urgent necessity how important diversification is, and we also see how it can be turned to good account for Texas and the rest of the world.

The landlords, the merchants, and the banks ought to cooperate to induce and encourage the tenant farmers to devote to other crops at least a part of the acreage they are usually required to plant to cotton. No doubt if properly assisted by merchants and bankers, and if permitted by the landlords to do so, thousands of tenant farmers would be glad to diversify, and thus increase their profits, the profits of the community, and the profits of the landlords. Texas will not need to make much more than half the usual cotton crop next year if the war continues, and it is important to utilize the acreage taken from cotton production to crops which will produce the best results for all concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. Just briefly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The question which occurred to my mind is, Will not the cotton market be greatly curtailed in any event owing to the European wars and the fact that the factories are closed?

Mr. BURGESS. I am coming to that now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am glad of it, because I wanted to know.

Mr. BURGESS. Now a word in conclusion: I do not know how long this war will last, nor does anybody else. It is practically certain that we will have a surplus of from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 bales of cotton left over from this year's crop. It is vital that next year's crop be not exceeding 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 bales. How this will be done, I do not know. That it must be done in some way, if we would preserve the equilibrium between the law of supply and demand, and thus maintain the price, is absolutely certain. I suggest to the farmers and cotton raisers of the country that now is the very time to study every method of diversification of crops. Plant less in cotton and more in corn and forage crops, raise more poultry and live stock, and be prepared for next year's trouble. "A stitch in time saves nine." [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as it is impossible to maintain a quorum, and less than 50 gentlemen are present to hear one of the best speeches that has been delivered in this House, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Regular order!

Mr. HEFLIN. I just want to suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. BUTLER. I am not going to make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BUTLER) there were—ayes 8, noes 56.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the point of no quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I make it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. How much time remains for general debate?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers on the question of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate has consumed 2 hours and 20 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. FERRIS. This is not a question on which the gentleman can have tellers. The Chair has just determined that there is a quorum here.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there was a mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentlemen are all anxious to go on, I will not insist.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM].

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I call to the attention of the committee an official map of Alaska upon which I have superimposed the proposed lines of Government railway in Alaska. They are the lines which the Government is now surveying under the bill passed by Congress appropriating $35,000,000 for building railroads in that Territory. I call your attention also to the fact that this map shows the location of the well-known coal areas in that Territory, which have been put upon this map so the House may see their relation to the proposed lines of railways.

Mr. GOULDEN. I trust the gentleman will use the pointer, so that we can determine just what it is. I do not think it is quite clear, at least not to me.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. There are three principal coal areas in Alaska. They are the principal coal areas, not because they are the largest ones in Alaska, but because they contain the highest grades of coal and are nearest to possible transportation. The first is the Bering River coal field. It is in southern Alaska, within 25 miles of the seacoast. The Copper River & Northwestern Railroad is now constructed for 196 miles, from Cordova to Kennicott, and passes within 25 miles of this coal field. It is a first-class standard-gauge railway, rock ballasted, with steel bridges. It is one of the finest railways in the United States, and by the building of 25 or 30 miles of additional spur it will reach the Bering River coal field.

If this bill passes, I am informed that spur will be immediately built by the Copper River & Northwestern Railway, and that coal field will immediately come into use for the people of the coast. The next coal field of importance is the Matanuska coal field, which you will notice at this point on the map. It is about 170 miles from the coast, in the interior of Alaska. It is on a proposed line of the Alaskan Northern Railroad, which is now built from Seward, on the southern seacoast, 70 miles northward, in the direction of this coal field. The Government, under the railway bill recently passed by this House, is now completing the surveys along this line of railway from Seward and from the harbor known as Portage Bay, just to the eastward of it, up to the Matanuska coal field, and then on to the interior of Alaska through the Nenana coal field. The Matanuska coal field is important, because it is a much larger field than the Bering River field. It is not only much larger, but the coal veins are said by the Geological Survey to be in better shape than the former. The Bering River veins have been distorted by volcanic action, and the coal has been much broken. It is a high-grade coal, but it is badly broken, while the Matanuska coal is much less distorted and equal in high grade. Both in the Bering River and Matanuska fields are high-grade anthracite and bituminous coals, and they are the only high-grade anthracite and bituminous coals on the Pacific coast. California has no coal, or substantially none. Oregon has some coal, but it is a very low grade and in very small quantities.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have heard it stated that a great deal of coal in Alaska is lignite coal. Will the gentleman point out that field?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The Nenana field, north of the Matanuska field, is lignite.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the price on this is to be 2 cents in this bill.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Not less than 2 cents per ton royalty. I exhibit to the gentleman from Texas a photograph of some of the Nenana coal veins.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the width of that vein?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. One of the veins is 105 feet thick. It is in a great white sandstone cliff formation, and the coal veins extend back into the country for many miles.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will it have to be taken out by stripping?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It will have to be mined in the usual way. It is incased between heavy white sandstone strata.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is aware that the price we pay for coal is covered to a great extent by the thickness of the vein and its accessibility. Is it possible, without giving the widest latitude to the Secretary of the Interior, to set any price on the various banks of coal to be leased under this law? Ought not great latitude to be given to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have no doubt great latitude ought to be given, and great latitude is given in this bill. The bill fixes only a minimum, and not a maximum.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman give us the area of these fields? And I would also like him to state whether this lignite has any commercial value except for local use?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The Bering River field has only about 45 square miles. It is a small field, but it has very heavy veins, and there is much more coal on a given area than, for instance, in Illinois, where the veins are much less in thickness.

Mr. BUTLER. From which property did the Navy obtain its coal for experimental purposes?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It obtained it from the Bering River coal.

Mr. BUTLER. Which was not found desirable. Do they have to go back into the Territory to find coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The Government is now bringing coal out from Matanuska for another test.

Mr. BUTLER. Have they not already tested it?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. It is lying out on the bank ready for shipment. They have only tested one vein in the Bering River coal field. There are many veins there, and I have no doubt from the statement of the Geological Survey, which has given much attention to these fields, that there are veins other than that which are of higher grade and contain good naval coal.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alaska yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Has that test been completed—of the Bering River coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; that single test from a single vein of the Bering River coal was completed.

Mr. GOULDEN. How does that compare with the Pennsylvania bituminous and Pennsylvania hard coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It did not compare well. It was far below the Pennsylvania coal. But only one test from one vein was made, and that was substantially surface coal.

Mr. MADDEN. It had but 43 per cent of the efficiency of Pocahontas coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; that is probably correct.

Now, the Bering River field has about 44 square miles in area. The Matanuska field has something like 100 square miles, and nobody really knows how much more. They know it has that much, and Dr. Brooks is so honest in his statement that he always errs on the side of accurate statement. In his statement he gives figures for only what really exists; but he also says that there may be many times the amount of coal that he gives in the official statement.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the thickness of these veins in Matanuska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. About 10 feet in thickness. There are in those fields both anthracite and high-grade bituminous coals.

Now, when you get to the Nenana field, that is a lignite coal; but for many purposes it is even better than anthracite. For local use it is good. If we had that coal for the development of our mines in the interior of Alaska, it would be all that we would want. Substantially all that we need in the whole interior of Alaska is to have that Nenana coal field opened up to use, and substantially what the Government needs is the opening of the Matanuska fields, which have these high-grade coals which are supposed to be naval coals.

Then, too, there is a large coal field here on Cooks Inlet. The veins are thick and heavy and there are great areas of coal there, but it is a low-grade coal.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is not that coal fit for heating and steaming purposes?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; it is all fit for that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It would answer, so far as the development of the country is concerned, for all practical purposes?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes. One trouble about this low-grade coal is that it is not a good shipping coal, first, because there is plenty of it in Washington, and, second, because it is liable to spontaneous combustion when confined.

We have up here in northern Alaska, along the Arctic slope, large fields of coal; over here by Nome there is a large deposit of coal; and up here at Cape Lisburne there are large deposits; and down through the Alaska Peninsula there are large veins of coal, thrust out into the sea, as they are here at Cooks Inlet. The Geological Survey reports that but one-fifth of the Territory of Alaska has been surveyed, and in that one-fifth they have determined there are about 12,000 square miles of what may be called coal-bearing areas; and if the other four-fifths shall come up to that, we shall have about 60,000 square miles of coal-bearing areas in Alaska, and the probability is that there is even much more than that. But with all this wealth of coal in Alaska and the great demand for its use in development, with everything in that Territory standing still for the want of it, we have to buy British Columbia coal. For 10 years now almost every pound of coal that has been used in that Territory has been purchased from the British Columbia coal fields, mined very largely by Chinese and other cheap labor, and whence the coal has been carried to Alaska and burned in sight of the greatest coal veins in the world.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Has there not been some coal in the last year brought in from Australia?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; some was brought from Australia and some from Japan.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But practically all the coal burned in Alaska in the last few years is foreign coal, brought there in foreign ships?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; substantially all of it.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alaska yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman explain why this coal will not bear being carried in the holds of vessels?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The best grades are carried the same as the Pocahontas coal, but the cheaper grades, the lignites, are inflammable.

Mr. MOORE. Do they disintegrate?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. Spontaneous combustion sets in. The coal slakes, as it were, and ignites like all low-grade coals.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alaska yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not wish to anticipate the gentleman's speech, but he stated that practically all of the coal in the last several years had been imported. What has been the price paid by the consumer, and what could the coal be mined for if it were obtained in the mines of Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The consumer in Alaska has paid all the way from $10 to $20 a ton; $10 per ton when Juneau and some of the other towns in the Territory built a public wharf and spent the public money in bringing up coal from British Columbia and selling it to the people at cost on the wharf, and from $18 to $20 when the towns were restrained by the courts from dealing in coal and when the people were compelled again to purchase from the foreign importer.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I remember seeing it stated last winter that coal sold up there at as high as $22.50.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And at $28 a ton right here [indicating on map].

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; it has been sold to the United States at Army posts for as high as $28 per ton.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know how many tons of coal were used last year in Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I can not give you the exact data.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman did not answer my question fully. My question was what would be the cost if this coal were mined in Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Testimony before various committees is that it would cost from $1.75 to $2 per ton, and according to the statement of Mr. Griffith, who went up from Pennsylvania to make an examination of these veins, it would cost $1.87 per ton to mine, without transportation.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman desires, I can supply the figures asked for by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. In 1912 there were only 355 tons produced by Alaskans, and in 1913 there were only 1,200 tons produced, while there were 100,000 tons consumed, showing that the withdrawal has kept them from producing even enough to supply themselves.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. All the coal shipped to Juneau and the other points is bituminous coal, is it not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; it is.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Has the superior coal from any of these large fields been mined to any large extent?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; not at all.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. So that really the full quality of the veins has never been determined.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Not by extensive mining.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And it may be of equal value with the Pocahontas coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have no doubt that it is. The truth is the Geological Survey, under Dr. Brooks, has for 12 or 14 years been making the most extensive and careful investigations into the value and extent of the Alaskan coal fields, and it has made some very interesting reports, all of which are in print, in the form of public documents, and give us exact data, so that we are justified in saying that we think some of this coal is equal to the coals of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do these examinations and reports by Dr. Brooks go to the economic value of the coal or to the quality of the coal as compared with other coals, like the West Virginia coals?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Both. There have been very full reports. Then the railroad reports have gone into that matter very largely also.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman how he disposes of the laboratory tests and other actual tests of the coal made by the Navy Department, which found that it was not equal to the Pocahontas coal in certain qualities?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is a verity. That is not to be disposed of.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is true, is it?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is true, so far as it goes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is not a good coal for certain purposes?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. I do not admit that. The test they made showed that the coal they examined was not as good as the best Pennsylvania coal, but it was a test of coal off the surface, substantially, and Dr. Brooks does not think that determines anything except that that particular examination was not of good coal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have plenty of good coal in Alaska. There is something else the matter, and it is that to which I want to call the attention of the House for a few minutes.

With the great demand for coal on the Pacific coast, with substantially no high coal of this character on that coast at all, we are obliged to get all our high-grade coals from Pennsylvania or from some other of the mines in the East, although we have an abundance of it in Alaska. That condition has existed for so many years that it is important to know why it exists.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. How long does it take to get coal from Pennsylvania into Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That depends on where you undertake to ship it in Alaska. If you take it to Fairbanks, where I live, it would take possibly six months, for it would have to be carried around the Horn, as most of it is, or across the continent by railway, and transshipped at Seattle or San Francisco for Alaska, and again transshipped at the mouth of the Yukon River and carried 1,100 or 1,200 miles up that river, while there is within 50 miles of Fairbanks, just across the valley in sight, one of the greatest coal beds in America.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. How long would it take to go from San Francisco to one of those ports in Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. To St. Michael, 9 or 10 days, and probably 18 or 20 days additional to Fairbanks. But the coal must be transshipped at St. Michael from ocean to river steamers. When Alaska prospectors first discovered the coal fields of Katalla and Matanuska, the only high-grade coals on the Pacific coast, the United States coal-land laws were not in force and effect in that Territory.

Alaska was given a very limited form of government by the act of Congress of May 17, 1884, but the last clause of section 8 of that act declared:

> But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to put in force in said district the general land laws of the United States.

From that moment we had no coal-land laws in Alaska for many years. The coal-land laws of the United States were especially excluded from Alaska by the act of May 17, 1884, and when the extensive deposits of high-grade coals were thereafter discovered there was no law authorizing their location or sale even to those who should open or work such mines.

The coal-land laws were first extended to Alaska by the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 658), and I quote this in full to show how very brief it was and to show you its exact terms, because it had no effect at all:

> An act to extend the coal-land laws to the District of Alaska.
> Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the public-land laws of the United States are hereby extended to the District of Alaska as relate to coal lands, namely, sections 2347 to 2352, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes.

When that act passed, the coal-land laws in force in the United States specifically mentioned became in full force in Alaska. But it was soon discovered that even this extension gave no immediate relief, since the United States coal-land laws applied only to surveyed lands, and the lands in Alaska were not surveyed. To cure this defect Congress passed the act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stat. L., 525), which authorized the location of coal lands upon unsurveyed land, by special survey.

This act was as follows:

> An act to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the coal-land laws to the District of Alaska," approved June 6, 1900.
> Be it enacted, etc., That any person or association of persons qualified to make entry under the coal-land laws of the United States, who shall have opened or improved a coal mine or coal mines on any of the unsurveyed public lands of the United States in the District of Alaska may locate the lands upon which such mine or mines are situated in rectangular tracts containing 40, 80, or 160 acres, with north and south boundary lines run according to the true meridian, by marking the four corners thereof with permanent monuments, so that the boundaries thereof may be readily and easily traced. And all such locators shall, within one year from the passage of this act, or within one year from making such location, file for record in the recording district, and with the register and receiver of the land district in which the lands are located or situated, a notice containing the name or names of the locator or locators, the date of the location, the description of the lands located, and a reference to such natural objects or permanent monuments as will readily identify the same.
> SEC. 2. That such locator or locators, or their assigns, who are citizens of the United States, shall receive a patent to the lands located by presenting, at any time within three years from the date of such notice, to the register and receiver of the land district in which the lands so located are situated, an application therefor, accompanied by a certified copy of a plat of survey and field notes thereof, made by a United States deputy surveyor or a United States mineral surveyor duly approved by the surveyor general for the District of Alaska, and a payment of the sum of $10 per acre for the lands applied for; but no such application shall be allowed until after the applicant has caused a notice of the presentation thereof, embracing a description of the lands, to have been published in a newspaper in the District of Alaska published nearest the location of the premises for a period of 60 days, and shall have caused copies of such notice, together with a certified copy of the official plat or survey, to have been kept posted in a conspicuous place upon the land applied for and in the land office for the district in which the lands are located for a like period, and until after he shall have furnished proof of such publication and posting, and such other proof as is required by the coal-land laws: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize entries to be made or title to be acquired to the shore of any navigable waters within said district.
> SEC. 3. That during such period of posting and publication, or within six months thereafter, any person or association of persons having or asserting any adverse interest or claim to the tract of land or any part thereof sought to be purchased shall file in the land office where such application is pending, under oath, an adverse claim, setting forth the nature and extent thereof, and such adverse claimant shall, within 60 days after the filing of such adverse claim, begin an action to quiet title in a court of competent jurisdiction within the District of Alaska, and thereafter no patent shall issue for such claim until the final adjudication of the rights of the parties, and such patent shall then be issued in conformity with the final decree of such court therein.
> SEC. 4. That all the provisions of the coal-land laws of the United States not in conflict with the provisions of this act shall continue and be in full force in the District of Alaska.
> Approved, April 28, 1904.

It will be seen that this law permitted a coal locator in Alaska to locate 160 acres of coal lands just as he would locate a mining claim, by setting stakes at the four corners, by having a private survey of his claim made and filed in and approved by the Land Office. Thereupon he might purchase the claim as he might have purchased surveyed coal land had there been any in Alaska.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did Alaska have any Delegate in Congress at that time?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; there was no Delegate until 1907. It will be noticed that the last section of that act extended the provisions of the coal-land laws of the United States not in conflict with the provisions of the act to the District of Alaska, but from 1884 to 1904 there was no coal-land law at all in force in Alaska under which a locator could purchase a single foot of coal land.

Under these acts several hundred coal-land locations were made in the Katalla and Matanuska fields, work of improvement was begun, railroads were projected, towns were located and built on the public domain, and large sums invested by coal locators and the public generally upon the anticipated development of the coal and other resources of the region. The high grade of these coals, the fact that there were no other coals of equal grade on the Pacific coast, their proximity to the seaboard, the opportunity for cheap mining, short hauls, and the entire Pacific for a market, soon led to speculation and efforts at monopoly, even before titles were obtained. This threat of monopoly caused Congress to pass the act of March 28, 1908, the most drastic antimonopoly law which has ever been placed on any statute book, and which is as follows:

> [Public—No. 151.]
> An act (S. 6805) to encourage the development of coal deposits in the Territory of Alaska.
> Be it enacted, etc., That all persons, their heirs or assigns, who have in good faith personally or by an attorney in fact made locations of coal land in the Territory of Alaska in their own interest, prior to November 12, 1906, or in accordance with circular of instructions issued by the Secretary of the Interior May 16, 1907, may consolidate their said claims or locations by including in a single claim, location, or purchase not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands, not exceeding in length twice the width of the tract thus consolidated, and for this purpose such persons, their heirs or assigns, may form associations or corporations, who may perfect entry of and acquire title to such lands in accordance with the other provisions of law under which said locations were originally made: Provided, That no corporation shall be permitted to consolidate its claims under this act unless 75 per cent of its stock shall be held by persons qualified to enter coal lands in Alaska.
> SEC. 2. That the United States shall at all times have the preference right to purchase so much of the product of any mine or mines opened upon the lands sold under the provisions of this act as may be necessary for the use of the Army and Navy, and at such reasonable and remunerative price as may be fixed by the President; but the producers of any coal so purchased who may be dissatisfied with the price thus fixed shall have the right to prosecute suits against the United States in the Court of Claims for the recovery of any additional sum or sums they may claim as justly due upon such purchase.
> SEC. 3. That if any of the lands or deposits purchased under the provisions of this act shall be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever so that they form part of, or in any way effect any combination, or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, or of any holding of such lands by any individuals, partnership, association, corporation, mortgage, stock ownership, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the District of Alaska, the title thereto shall be forfeited to the United States by proceedings instituted by the Attorney General of the United States in the courts for that purpose.

SEC. 4. That every patent issued under this act shall expressly recite the terms and conditions prescribed in sections 2 and 3 hereof.

Approved, May 28, 1908.

With the approval of the act of Congress of 1908 the Territory of Alaska had, and now has, in force there:

First. All the general coal-land laws in force in the United States, all the general coal-land laws which provide for the disposal of coal lands in Wyoming, Arizona, Colorado, and the other public-domain States;

Second. The act of Congress of April 28, 1904, permitting the location and sale of coal lands upon the unsurveyed public domain in Alaska, a favor not possessed by the States in the public-land States of the United States; and Third. The act of Congress of May 28, 1908, authorizing a consolidation or grouping of Alaskan coal lands to the amount of 2,560 acres for large enterprises, giving the United States a preference right to purchase the output for the use of the Army and Navy, and with a drastic antimonopoly clause forfeiting the title of the land to the United States for any unlawful trust or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of the coal mined in Alaska.

Alaska now has, under the plan of private ownership in force in the United States, the most favorable coal-land laws in American territory. We are specially favored, because we have not only the same general coal-land laws in force in the public-domain States of the Union, but the additional special acts of Congress of 1904 and 1908.

After the passage of the act of Congress of 1904, permitting the location of unsurveyed coal lands in Alaska, coal-land claimants there began to locate and make proof to acquire title to the coal lands at Katalla and Matanuska. The small area and high grade of the coal deposits and their proximity to the harbors of the Pacific promised great value and tremendous profits to the owners, and speculators rushed in to secure advantages. Those officially responsible for the enforcement of the coal laws of the United States in that Territory soon brought charges of grave irregularities and efforts to secure a monopoly by those in charge of transportation and capital. These charges provoked so much public interest and seemed to be so well founded that the following official correspondence was had, resulting in the Executive order of November 7, 1906:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., November 5, 1906.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In further reference to department letter of September 20, No. 2698–1906, L. & R. Div., in reference to withdrawals of land from coal entry, and continuing my reply thereto:

In previous recommendations no reference has been made to coal lands in Alaska. The coal and lignite deposits of that Territory are known to be of commercial value, and much attention has been given to their investigation by this survey. The reasons for withdrawing this coal from entry are fully as urgent as in the case of that in the Western States and Territories, and I therefore suggest that the matter be brought to the attention of the President. Since the land office surveys have not yet been generally extended over Alaska, the coal lands can not be designated by legal subdivision, and I therefore recommend that the order suspending coal entries be made to apply to the entire Territory.

I am sending with this a map of Alaska, showing the distribution of coal and lignites so far as known and also other mineral deposits, the economical development of which is dependent on a cheap fuel supply.

Very respectfully,

H. C. RIZER, Acting Director.

Approved:

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, November 7, 1906.

The PRESIDENT:

I transmit herewith a copy of a letter of the 3d instant from the Acting Director of the Geological Survey, with the accompanying map, in which he has recommended that the matter of withdrawing coal lands from entry in the District of Alaska be brought to your attention.

He has stated that the reasons for withdrawing these coal lands from entry are fully as urgent as in the cases of the withdrawals in the Western States and Territories, and I have the honor to request, therefore, that you inform me of the action which you desire taken on the recommendation of the acting director that the order suspending coal entries be made to apply to the entire District of Alaska.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 7, 1906.

To the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR:

In reference to your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing letter of the Acting Director of the United States Geological Survey of November 3, I direct that the proposed action in reference to the coal lands of Alaska be taken. I return the letter of the acting director herewith.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, November 12, 1906.

Respectfully referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who will take the steps necessary to carry the directions of the President into effect and report action to the department.

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Protests were at once made by Alaska coal-land locators that the President's withdrawal prevented those who had made valid and legal locations of coal lands from further complying with the law in their efforts to acquire patents, and two months later the following modification of the President's order was promulgated:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 15, 1907.

The COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

SIR: By direction of the President all orders heretofore issued withdrawing public lands from entry under the coal-land laws are hereby amended as follows:

"Nothing in any withdrawal of lands from coal entry heretofore made shall impair any right acquired in good faith under the coal-land laws and existent at the date of such withdrawals."

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Of the many hundreds of coal-land locations then pending in the United States land offices in Alaska and before the Department of the Interior two only have been allowed to prove up and acquire title—one located on the Kenai Peninsula and the other on Admiralty Island. Those two claims have an area of less than 320 acres, contain only low-grade coal, and neither is in the Matanuska or Katalla high-grade fields. All other Alaska coal claims are yet pending or have been canceled for failure to comply with the law.

It never was doubted that we did not have good coal-land laws applicable to Alaska; but the whole difficulty there has arisen between two great sections of political thought, one of which wanted the Government to hold the title to all Alaska coal land and the other wanted to give it out to private ownership. My opinion as to whether the Government ownership of coal lands in Alaska is best or whether private ownership is best is about as worthless a statement as I could make to the House. The people of this country have determined that question, and those in Alaska who prefer private ownership are helpless and in a small minority. The people of this country have determined for themselves that they intend to reserve to the Government the ownership of coal lands, and while I do not approve of everything in the bill from the standpoint of the general public sentiment, it is a good bill, and with one or two amendments I hope this House will pass it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes more.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. But troubles arose. They began in Washington, where one branch of the Government was arrayed against another. One branch insisted that there was fraud in Alaska, and there was much to support that insistence, for there certainly were frauds there. The other insisted that all it was necessary was to try out the frauds, throw out the fraudulent claims, and issue patents to those not fraudulent. But after the modification of the order of withdrawal every man who had an honest claim in Alaska, under the coal-land laws, if he could get a hearing and a decision, had the right to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How many of these claims were there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Five hundred and sixty are yet undetermined that existed on November 12, 1906.

Mr. MADDEN How many have been determined?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. About an equal number.

Mr. MADDEN. How many were contested cases?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not know except the Cunningham cases were contested.

Mr. MADDEN. So, as matter of fact, all the rest of the claims were legitimate claims?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not know about that.

Mr. MADDEN. If they were adjusted, they were.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. There are 560 claims not yet determined, and I can not tell about those—they are yet unadjusted.

Mr. MADDEN. How many of the 560 claims that have been adjudicated have received patents?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Two.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the reason the other patents have not been issued? I am asking in good faith, and I think it ought to go into the RECORD if there is a legitimate reason where a man made an application for a homestead or a mining right, or whatever it is, whenever his case has been adjudicated and proved that he is entitled to the claim, why should not a patent issue?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The 560 cases have not been decided yet, and, of course, a patent can not issue until the cases are decided.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that 560 had been decided.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; but as to them there is no patent; they were all decided adversely to the claimants. The other 560 have not been decided by the department, and there may never be any patents issued except the 2 mentioned.

Mr. MADDEN. And of the 560 that have been adjudicated only 2 patents have issued?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The other 558 have been decided adversely?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And only two cases have been decided favorably to the claimants?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is all.

It is generally conceded that the Executive order of November, 1906, withdrawing all Alaska coal lands from location was made in violation of law. Congress undertook to cure the want of authority by passing the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 847), commonly known as the Pickett bill, and thereafter, on July 2, 1910, President Taft, by Executive order, "ratified, confirmed, and continued in full force and effect" the order of November, 1906, made by President Roosevelt. Whether this last Executive order of withdrawal of all coal land in Alaska from location is valid or not is doubtful, but it is effective.

I now place in the RECORD, Mr. Chairman, the official order of July 1, 1910, made by President Taft, ratifying and confirming the former orders made by the President:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, July 1, 1910.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: In accordance with your instructions, I recommend the withdrawal for classification and in aid of legislation affecting the use and disposition of coal deposits belonging to the United States of the following areas:

ORDER OF WITHDRAWAL.

It is hereby ordered that that certain order of withdrawal made heretofore on November 12, 1906, is hereby ratified, confirmed, and continued in full force and effect, and subject to all the provisions, limitations, exceptions, and conditions contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases," approved June 25, 1910, there is hereby withdrawn from settlement, location, sale, or entry, and reserved for classification and in aid of legislation affecting the use and disposition of coal deposits, all the public lands and lands in national forests in the District of Alaska in which workable coal is known to occur.

Very respectfully,
GEO. OTIS SMITH,
Director.

JULY 1, 1910.

Respectfully referred to the President with the recommendation that the same be approved.

R. A. BALLINGER,
Secretary.

Approved, July 2, 1910, and referred to the Secretary of the Interior.
WM. H. TAFT,
President.

Having thus closed every avenue of development and prevented any attempt to open the coal fields of Alaska through private ownership, Congress is now considering how those coal fields may be opened to the use of the people under Government supervision and control.

The solution of the problem is offered in H. R. 14233, "A bill to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," now pending before the House. This bill was unanimously approved and reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, and is also specially approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice this bill provides that 5,160 acres shall be reserved to the Government in the Bering coal field.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And seven thousand and odd in the Matanuska field?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask how it was decided that fifty-one hundred and odd acres and seventy-one hundred and odd acres were the exact quantities of land that ought to be reserved to the United States?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I think probably the chairman of the committee can give the gentleman that information better than I can.

Mr. FERRIS. That was the area suggested by the department, and naturally is more or less arbitrary.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Fifty-one hundred and twenty acres equals eight sections of land.

Mr. FERRIS. The Matanuska field is about twice as large as the Bering field. It is something of a per cent of the total. I do not suppose it would make much difference if they added an acre here or took off an acre there.

Mr. HARDY. Would it not have been better in that reservation, instead of saying not exceeding so much, to say not less than so much? Should not the Government be given the right to reserve more of that land if it wants to?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. In addition to that, I will say that the bill also provides that the President of the United States may reserve not to exceed 5,000 acres in every other coal field in Alaska, of which there are many, so that under the law as it now exists the President can reserve probably 25 or 30 areas of 5,000 acres each in these various coal fields.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Right in that connection I notice the bill provides that the Government of the United States may go into the coal district on these reservations and regulate the price of coal in case there should be arbitrary prices made for coal that is being sold to the public.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Well?

Mr. MADDEN. Is it the intention of this reservation to have the Government of the United States go into the business of mining coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I must again refer the gentleman to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the question answered.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman from Alaska yield to me?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. On page 2 of the bill there is a proviso which undoubtedly does what the gentleman says. That proviso is as follows:

Provided, That the deposits in said reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the coal is required for Government works or in the construction and operation of Government railroads or is required by the Navy or is necessary for national protection or for relief from oppressive conditions brought about through a monopoly of coal.

It undoubtedly does. We have just authorized the Government to build a railroad, and we undoubtedly ought to have the right to run the railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes—to run the railroad; but you are giving the Government the right to sell coal.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, at this point I will ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some letters and telegrams which I have received from people in Alaska in favor of this bill without reading them.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CONRY). The gentleman from Alaska asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain letters and telegrams. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters and telegrams referred to are as follows:

CORDOVA, ALASKA, July 15, 1913.

Hon. JAMES WICKERSHAM,
Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a matter of principle we have heretofore opposed what is termed the "leasing system" as applied to the coal and oil lands of Alaska. We have believed that the laws that have in the past so well conduced to the settlement, development, and prosperity of the Western States and Territories of the Union will, if administered with the same liberality, result in an equal measure of prosperity and happiness for the people of Alaska.

The Government, however, seems to have resolved upon a change of policy in the handling and disposition of the public lands. It is unfortunate for us, to say the least, that Alaska happens to be the dog upon which the experiment is to be tried. Such is the fact, however, and we are disposed to recognize and make the best of the situation and give such assistance as we can in working out a practical solution of the questions so vitally affecting the general welfare of Alaska along the lines now being considered by Congress. When we compare the present condition of the Territory and its people with what it would most surely have become under a policy that permitted the free use of our coal and oil in the development of the great resources of the Territory we become somewhat discouraged and desperate and in the humor to support any policy that promises a measure of relief, however inadequate. We want our coal mines opened and the resources of Alaska developed. We will welcome any form of legislation that will contribute to this end. We deprecate any action upon the part of any man or organization of men that tends to delay or defeat such legislation. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the inhabitants of Cordova in mass meeting assembled and by the chamber of commerce of said town:

First. We favor the immediate enactment of any leasing law or other form of legislation, sufficiently broad and comprehensive to induce and bring about the opening of our coal mines and the consequent development of the great latent resources of Alaska.

Second. We deprecate and condemn the action of some so-called friends of Alaska, in opposing such legislation, as unwise and untimely and prompted by personal and selfish interests.

Respectfully submitted.

CORDOVA, ALASKA, August 14, 1914.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully call your attention to the necessity for immediate action in the matter of throwing open Alaska coal. We do not presume to suggest the method by which this should be done. What we do insist upon is that it is absolutely necessary to open it in some way at once, either through a leasing system, private ownership, or Government operation, to the end that the coal may be used, not only in Alaska, but on the Pacific coast as well.

In support of this proposition we submit that practically all the coal consumed in Alaska, as well as a large percentage of that used on the Pacific coast, comes from British Columbia. Should this supply be cut off through the war now raging over all Europe, our industries, few as they are, will be paralyzed and widespread desolation will follow.

If Canada herself does not see fit to prohibit the exportation of coal, there is nothing to prevent the nations at war with Great Britain from capturing English coal on the high seas, or even destroying the works on the British Columbia coast.

The war has already resulted in a large increase in the price of all foodstuff and supplies in this Northland, and with the decrease in the value of copper the indications are that these mines will shut down.

Foreign capital is being withdrawn and the mines operated and developed by this money closed down. As an example, we point to the Jualin mine at Juneau and the Mother Lode of the Copper River section, each of which has ceased work since war was declared.

To Alaska the situation is serious, and we believe it is of equal importance to the United States as a whole.

The coal for naval use on the Pacific has been brought around from the Atlantic. To bring this coal to the Pacific it was necessary to use foreign vessels. These foreign vessels are no longer available. There are no American ships for this purpose. Every vessel which flies the American flag which can by any possibility be used for the purpose will be needed for our over-sea trade to take the place of foreign ships that have been withdrawn from the trade. The opening of Alaska coal is therefore a national necessity. It is a necessary part in the scheme for national defense, and the last few weeks have demonstrated that we can not afford to neglect any possible measure tending to strengthen our national defense.

If it is urged that the coal in Alaska is not suited to naval use, we reply that the test made was simply a test of one vein of coal, and is therefore no proof of the field. We confidently assert that the Bering River field has large quantities of coal suitable for naval use, and refer to such eminent geologists as Drs. Brooks and Martin, of the United States Geological Survey, as our authority.

The Bering River field can be opened and coal placed on the market at Cordova in 90 days from the beginning of operations. A line of railroad 38 miles long, branching from Mile 38 on the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad, will reach to the heart of the field.

With these conditions surrounding us, we respectfully ask, "Is it the part of good judgment to longer delay the opening of Alaska coal on some basis, either by a leasing bill of such liberal provisions that American capital will undertake it or by Government operation?"

We appeal to you, who have the power and authority to do this, to give it your earnest and conscientious consideration, believing that you will arrive at the same conclusion that we have, viz, that the opening of Alaska coal is not only an absolute necessity, but a duty that Congress should at once perform.

Very respectfully,

CORDOVA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
G. C. HAZELET, President.
H. G. STEEL, Secretary.

HAINES, ALASKA, August 14, 1914.

Hon. JAMES WICKERSHAM,
Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By instructions of the chamber of commerce I have on this date wired the Hon. Franklin K. Lane as follows:

"Request Alaska coal fields open; British Columbia supply liable cut off; good chance Alaskans establish market."

And, further, we wrote the honorable Secretary as follows:

"We believe that should the British Columbia supply be suspended that the development of Alaska would be very much retarded; and, further, that now is a splendid time for the Alaskan coal miner to establish a market for his product."

We hope that you gentlemen in Congress will find some way in relieving the threatened situation.

Very respectfully,

THE HAINES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By HENRY P. M. BIRKINBINE, Secretary.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What has been the condition with reference to individuals who may have attempted to help themselves to any of this coal for local use?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, they have been threatened with arrest and have not been allowed to mine coal because it is said to be in violation of the law. Now, if the committee will bear with me for a few minutes I want to talk about an amendment which I desire to have inserted in this bill. I want an amendment put in this bill, if I can get it, and the chairman of the committee thinks substantially it can be done, which is a copy of section 11 of the Adamson power bill. That bill has passed this House, and the clause which I wish to offer as an amendment to the Alaska coal bill is substantially copied from section 11 of the Adamson bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Where does the gentleman want to put it?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. At any appropriate place.

Section 11 of the Adamson bill as it passed this House, and which I wish to add to the bill now under consideration as an amendment thereto, reads:

SEC. 11. That in all cases where the electric current generated from or by any of the projects provided for in this act, including leases under section 14 hereof, shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce, the rates, charges, and service for the same to the consumers thereof shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable and unduly discriminatory charge, rate, or service therefor is hereby prohibited and declared to be illegal; and whenever the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that the rates or charges demanded or collected on the service rendered for such electric current are unjust, unreasonable, or unduly discriminatory, upon complaint made therefor and full hearing thereon, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be the just and reasonable rates and charges therefor to be observed as the maximum to be charged and the service to be rendered; and in case of the violation of any such order of the Secretary of War the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it proposed to introduce an amendment to this bill which, if it passes, proposes to regulate the price of power created by the use of coal that is mined by private individuals and conveyed a distance from the mines?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; this relates to the price of the coal mined by the lessees upon Government coal lands.

Mr. MADDEN. That will affect the current?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; it will affect only the coal on these coal leases.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have the power to fix the price that the man who mines coal shall pay the Government and then fix the price at which the coal shall be sold to the private consumer?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes. I feel very strongly that the House ought to permit me to move an amendment to the bill that is substantially the same as one which has received the approval of the House. I refer to the Adamson bill, which is now before the Senate with the approval of this House. I have read the section, which I wish to add as an amendment, from the bill as it is in the Senate and which has had the approval of this House.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that it is my deliberate judgment that if any such amendment goes into this bill there never will be an acre of this coal land developed. No man living would invest his capital in the development of the coal fields and mine coal under a Government lease with the Government controlling not only the price that he shall pay for the coal that he mines but which controls the price of the coal which he sells.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is exactly what the House put in the Adamson power bill.

Mr. MADDEN. But we did not develop coal, the water is coming down continually——

Mr. WICKERSHAM. But you are leasing the Government power property, you are charging the lessee a royalty on the power, and then you are controlling the price, exactly what I want to do in this Alaska coal-leasing bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That bill has not yet passed.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It passed this House.

Mr. MADDEN. It did not pass me.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. But it passed this House. Now, in H. R. 16673, or the Ferris power bill, applying to all the public lands in the United States, is a similar provision. Section 3 of that bill provides:

SEC. 3. That in case of the development, generation, transmission, and use of power or energy under such a lease in a Territory, or in two or more States, the regulation and control of service and of charges for service to consumers and of the issuance of stock and bonds by the lessee is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior or committed to such body as may be provided by Federal statute: Provided, That the physical combination of plants or lines for the generation, distribution, and use of power or energy under this act or under leases given hereunder may be permitted, in the discretion of the Secretary, but combinations, agreements, arrangements, or understandings, express or implied, to limit the output of electrical energy, to restrain trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or within any one State, or to fix, maintain, or increase prices for electrical energy or service are hereby forbidden.

That is substantially the same provision that was in the Adamson bill, which has already passed the House and is now pending before the Senate. Some time ago Senator NELSON introduced a bill on the other side of this Capitol, drafted in the departments and which was one of a series known as the Taft conservation bills, substantially in accord with the bill now before this House. In that bill, S. 9055, in section 10, was this provision, and I read it not because the bill ever passed but because it had the approval of President Taft and of his administration, and was introduced in the Senate as one of the administration bills. Section 10 reads:

That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered, upon its own initiative or upon the complaint of an aggrieved party, after due hearing, to pass upon and determine and prescribe the present and future rates at which coal mined on the leased premises shall be sold by any lessee under this act in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of transportation rates of common carriers under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce"—

And so forth.

Now, that is substantially what I want here.

Mr. MADDEN. If I may interrupt the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alaska yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to say, that although these bills may have been written and may have been introduced, none of them has ever become the law, and I venture to say that if any such bill ever does become law that you will be dead long before they develop any coal mines in Alaska.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House and all bills of this kind have been drafted substantially after the model of the Canadian law, and I want to call the attention of the House to the Canadian law upon this particular question. I read from the "Coal Mining Regulations," printed by the Government Printing Bureau in 1910 in Ottawa, page 9:

13. All leases of coal-mining rights issued under these regulations shall be subject to the provision that actual settlers shall be entitled to buy at the pit's mouth whatever coal they may require for their own use, but not for barter or sale, at a price not to exceed $1.75 per ton, and the lease issued for coal rights shall be made subject to such provision.

Now, while that is not a reservation or a control of the price, it is the fixing of the price at which the settlers in that country may buy at the pit mouth, namely, $1.75 a ton. It is another way of controlling the price, and I call the attention of the House to that purpose.

Now, when the Adamson bill was before the House the other day, the leader of the majority of this House, Mr. UNDERWOOD, made a speech on this question which is a classic, and I commend it to my friend from Illinois. I am going to read a very brief portion of it, because it is full of common sense and it goes right to the point in this case. Congress ought not to pass an act giving the lessee a low rate of royalty and the contract right to charge any extortionate price he pleases. The theory of this bill is that the consumer is to have cheap coal, and that he can not have without the lessor, the United States, reserves some power to see that the consumer gets it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman would assume that there is no contradiction of that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I certainly would. Listen to what the gentleman from Alabama said when the Adamson bill was under consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not always believe what the gentleman from Alabama says.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is as clear as sunlight. On page 14175 of the RECORD of July 30, 1914, Mr. UNDERWOOD said this, and I hope the House will listen to it:

Then, what are the people interested in—your constituents and mine? They are primarily interested in but two things, in my judgment. One is that at the end of a fixed period the Government may again put its hand on the proposition and reconstruct it. The other is that during the life of that franchise they may receive the power generated by the plant at a fair and reasonable rate, and that is all they are interested in, because if they get their service at a fair price it is a matter of little concern to them who owns the dam and who controls it. Now, that being so, both those propositions are in the bill without a contest. If the American people can get capital to develop the water power, to furnish them light and heat, to create factories and foundries and employ labor; if they are assured that at the end of the fixed period they may recapture the franchise and readjust the conditions, and if during that period there is a fair and reasonable regulation of the price by public authority, I contend that it is not necessary to go further.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that he was against the provision of the bill that the gentleman from Alaska is now advocating. Mr. UNDERWOOD was opposed to the bill.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Not against what I suggest. He made a good argument in favor of the point I want. Let me read more:

I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that the present law fixes the date at 50 years; and, more than that, this bill puts into the law of the land what is not in the law of the land to-day, and that is the right of regulating the price. Now, that is what the people of the United States are interested in. You may say that the price is not going to be properly regulated. If you say that, why, we might as well abandon legislation and say that we can not legislate in the interests of the people. But if you admit what I believe will be the case—that a reasonable price will be fixed under this law—then the corporation can not amortize its investment, because that regulation will prevent it doing so, in view of the fact that it is going to be paid the fair value of the property at the end of this term, and it should not be allowed to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. OGLESBY. Would it not be better, for the sake of definiteness, so that the miner would know exactly what he could do with his coal in the way of profit, without having the Government come back later and change the price at which he should sell it, to make a lease to the man who will deliver it at the lowest rate at seaboard and pay the minimum price?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That might be a good proposition.

Mr. OGLESBY. That would be by agreement, and he would know in advance the conditions under which he could operate.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Here is what this Congress is proposing to do, to lease the coal lands in Alaska at a minimum price in royalty of not less than 2 cents per ton. The Senate bill, substantially the same as this, provides that there shall not be less than 2 nor more than 5 cents per ton. Now, the Government leases these lands at a minimum royalty. The bill provides for a contract of lease for an indeterminate term—perpetually—and the lessee enters under the contract signed by the United States, authorized by an act of Congress. The lessee is in possession under a contract authorized by Congress, which can not be changed for a long period of time. The contract as authorized by this bill will not even attempt to restrain or control the lessee in rates or prices, and he may charge the consumer all the traffic will bear.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is informed, and I am not, but I would like to ask if that coal would be in competition with the coal here in the East?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; substantially not. Really there will be no competition, and the lessee may charge such extortionate rates as he pleases.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought the gentleman said that.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. What I said was that there will be no other competition than that which will arise from coal mined in the eastern part of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. And that will be none?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That will be none. The Alaska lessee can put up the price as high as he pleases. Congress will then have created a Government monopoly under Government ownership, under such terms that can not be modified or changed for the life of the contract. It is proposed to enact a law authorizing the United States to lease its coal lands at the minimum rate of royalty, ostensibly to give the consumer cheap coal, but it is also then proposed by this bill to contract with the lessee that he may fix the price of the coal to the consumer without condition or limit. Having a Government contract for an indeterminate period, which can not be changed or modified, and having the lawful power to fix the rate without limit, a lessee will have a Government monopoly such as we have never yet been cursed with in America. The Government should not contract away its power to control excessive prices of the necessities of life, as is done with coal by this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I will yield first to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alaska yields to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. There will be competition between the owners of the mines, will there not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman know that the average rate of profit made by men who mine bituminous coal does not exceed and does not approach 5 cents a ton?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is true in the States of the East, where you have large areas of coal, but where, as there is in the Bering River coal fields, only a small area of 24 square miles, owned by one landlord—the United States—with one line of transportation to it——

Mr. MADDEN. I thought the Government was building a railroad there.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The conditions are such that the Government ought to keep its finger on the rate, just as we do on the freight transportation by railroads.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alaska yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. What is the character of the British Columbia coal that is sold on the coast now? Is it not a high-grade coal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is bituminous coal.

Mr. PLATT. It sells at from $14 to $20?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes. The Government has paid as high as $28 a ton in some places for it.

Mr. PLATT. Can this Alaska coal be put down cheaply?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; at $2 a ton, not including the transportation.

Mr. PLATT. But it has got to be put down at the seaboard, has it not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. You would not regard the British Columbia competition as a price regulator?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; not for the interior of Alaska. But in quality the British Columbia coal does not equal the Alaska coal.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alaska yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is talking on a subject of great importance, and I have tried to follow him, but I may have missed some of his discussion. Does the Government propose to hold this coal field?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does not the antitrust law extend to Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; the antitrust law has extended to all the country, but it is not effective and will have less effect when the United States has issued its contract of lease.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman believe there is danger of monopoly under conditions which he mentions, with the Government owning all the coal fields? How much will it reserve?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Five thousand acres in each field, or 15,000 in the three fields.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, with the Government reserves and with our antitrust laws and public sentiment growing every day in favor of enforcing them, does the gentleman believe there is any danger of monopoly in the coal fields of Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I am not talking so much about monopoly as about the question of price or excessive price.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The question of monopoly is the one I was interested in. So far as the price is concerned, if there is no monopoly the price will regulate itself, and the more you charge in the way of a lease that much more will eventually appear in the price.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. As it is now, the Government will charge them what it pleases. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose to offer to this bill, when I get an opportunity, is as follows:

That in all cases where the coal mined, extracted, or produced from any lands or mines leased under the provisions of this act shall be sold, exchanged, or stored in the Territory of Alaska or shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce the rates, prices, and charges for same to the consumers thereof shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable and unduly discriminatory rate, price, or charge therefor is hereby declared illegal, and whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall be of the opinion that the rates, prices, or charges demanded or collected for the sale, exchange, or storage of such coal are unjust, unreasonable, or unduly discriminatory, upon complaint made therefor and full hearing thereon the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what shall be the just and reasonable rates, prices, or charges therefor to be observed as the maximum to be charged, and in case of the violation of any such order of the Secretary of the Interior the provisions of this act relative to forfeiture and failure to comply shall apply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rule under which the committee is proceeding, the ordinary privilege of debate is not accorded in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. What I purpose to say has no more relevancy to the subject of the pending bill than the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], who addressed the committee a little while ago.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not ask unanimous consent?

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that the committee has no power to give unanimous consent; but I will say this, that if there is any gentleman here who objects to my addressing the House now upon a subject other than the bill, I hope he will interpose his objection now.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as the same privilege was accorded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], that the gentleman from Iowa may speak on any subject he chooses.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] may proceed to the discussion of matters not pertaining to the subject matter of this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Iowa object to stating what the subject matter of his speech will be?

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all; and I want to say further that if there are those here who desire to proceed upon this bill strictly, I do not want to stand in the way of debate upon the bill. My subject will be the nine months' effects of the present revenue laws with respect to labor and agriculture.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, we have not the right in committee to change the rule. The gentleman will have to get back in the House in order to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think it ill becomes a gentleman on that side to raise an objection after we granted the privilege to the gentleman from Texas to make a 40-minute address on a political subject?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Connecticut and myself are good friends, and the gentleman from Connecticut will recall that the other side not only agreed to a Member on our side using that time, but yielded half the time. Nobody is opposed to this bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, if it is agreed to commence to read the bill at the conclusion of that 30 minutes, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. All time has not expired for general debate yet.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Idaho if there are other gentlemen desiring to speak on this side?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, as I understand, there is no opposition to this bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I have quite a number of gentlemen upon the list of those who desire to speak upon the bill. Some of them are not ready this evening, and I hope, under the circumstances, and especially in view of the courtesy which was extended to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], the gentleman from Connecticut will permit the gentleman from Iowa to proceed.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under the rules, Mr. Chairman, if nobody desires to speak, of course the Clerk must proceed with the reading of the bill. We have no right to change a rule that was made in the House. We are here in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. The Chair should adhere to the rule, and the rule requires debate on the subject matter only.

Mr. GOOD. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, less than a year and a half ago the Republican Party, yielding to the result of an election rather than to the will of the people, relinquished control of every department of the National Government to its Democratic opponent. The pluralities prevailing at the general election of 1912 were such as to relieve the situation of all doubt that the voters of the country, then as theretofore, were rigorously opposed to the principles and policies of the Democratic Party. The great Republican Party, after a career of more than half a century replete with achievements evidencing the highest capacity and fitness for popular government, divided over the nomination of a candidate for the Presidency. The events which led up to that division, and ultimately to a change of party control in the Government, originated in an unfortunate series of party controversies—the belated outcome of methods of party procedure which had become both antiquated and obnoxious. The conceded facts, the clear-cut contentions which marked the division of Republicans at Chicago in June, 1912, leave no question as to the ability and desire of substantially the entire membership of the Republican Party to meet upon common ground touching all essential party principles and policies. And with the Republicans of the country upon common ground, supporting the great fundamental principles of that party, no opportunity would exist for Democrats to subject the prosperity and happiness of the people to experiments with fallacious theories and misconceptions. [Applause.]

The leaders of the Democratic Party were not only conscious of this when they met at Baltimore, but so keenly did it impress them that they were constrained to give a warning note proclaiming the opportunity that was not likely to pass their way again. Mark the language of their platform:

> At this time, when the Republican Party after a generation of unlimited power in its control of the Federal Government is rent into factions, it is opportune to point to the record of accomplishments of the Democratic House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress.

At this time, when the Republican Party is rent into factions, it is opportune to put forth the oft-rejected policies so aptly typified by the emblem of the Democratic Party. What a flash of instinctive wisdom illuminated their prophetic minds when they saw their great adversary slipping from the throne of reason and following the impulses of passion and anger. But, Mr. Chairman, reason may be relied upon to claim her own. She is a chaste mistress and not often found in company with Democratic opportunity.

But opportunity was present, and our genial Democratic friends were not slow to take advantage of it. They promulgated a platform characteristic of its authors and true to their modern sophistical system of philosophy. The document dealt with many particulars; in fact, as many as seemed to afford points of contact with every dissatisfied element and to give opportunity for the advancement of every fallacious theory. On the whole, it might have been resolved into one general proposal to give everybody everything. It promised a commercial system which, if judged by the declarations of its exponents upon the stump and later in the halls of Congress, would make everything bought cheap and everything sold dear. It promised to materially reduce the cost of the necessaries of life to the consumer, and at the same time greatly enhance the prosperity of the producers of those commodities. It promised to throw open the markets of this country to the competition of the world without injuring any legitimate industry. It promised to increase the opportunity, remuneration, and prosperity of American labor by putting its product in competition with the product of the underpaid labor of every foreign nation. It promised to give increased prosperity to the American farmer, and at the same time give over his market to the unrestricted competition of the agricultural products of the new and cheap lands of Canada and Argentina and every other foreign country with a surplus. It affected sincerity when it promised to build up an American merchant marine and to put the American flag again upon the sea, to redeem our share of the commerce of the world for American bottoms, without imposing any additional burden on the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury. And this notwithstanding the fact that every foreign nation now having substantial commerce on the sea pays a subsidy to its ships. It promised to administer the civil-service law honestly and rigidly, to the end that merit and ability should be the standard of appointment and promotion, with the implication, now verified by results, that every public station should be filled by a faithful Democrat. It promised a reduction in the number of offices and salaries, which, it was alleged, drained the substance of the people, but this Congress has created and is in process of creating more offices with higher salaries than any other Congress observed by the present generation. It denounced the profligate waste of money and lavish appropriations by recent Republican Congresses and demanded a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a Democratic government. This denouncement the Democratic Congress has followed by appropriating more money than was ever experienced before in the history of this country. It promised that the constitutional rights of American citizens should protect them on our borders and go with them throughout the world, and any American citizen residing or having property in any foreign country should be given protection both for himself and for his property. That promise, so far as our American citizens in Mexico are concerned, is yet to be fulfilled. It promised exemption from the payment of tolls of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal, a promise since repudiated under conditions which marked the action as one of "stupendous folly."

Denouncing the Republican policy of protection not merely as unwise and oppressive, but as unconstitutional, the Democrats once more declared for a policy of a revenue tariff as one not only calculated to relieve the people from oppression, but as one economically calculated to bring an enhanced and permanent prosperity. With a divided Republican Party the Democrats were successful at the election of 1912, notwithstanding their declaration of policies. They were to be given full control of every department of the Government at a time and under conditions which ought to prove the efficacy or inefficacy of the Democratic economic policy beyond every reasonable doubt. This country was never so strong, both industrially and financially, as it was at the time of the election of Woodrow Wilson to the Presidency and the present Democratic Congress in November, 1912. That year had marked the very apex of the prosperity of the American people. Never before had wealth been accumulated so rapidly in this country as during the four years preceding the present administration. At the time of the election in 1912 every industrial concern of the country was operating to its fullest capacity. All commodities were in demand at highly remunerative prices; labor of every class was more generally employed and at a higher standard of wages than ever before in the history of this or any other country. Our foreign commerce had been developed to a condition of greater volume, strength, and stability than we had ever before experienced. These were the conditions complained of by the adherents of the Democratic Party; these were the conditions which they promised to improve upon.

It is pertinent now to examine the record of occurrences which have transpired during the period of time since it became known that a change in the industrial policy of this country was about to take place. It is pertinent now to inquire whether conditions existing in 1912 have been improved upon as a result of Democratic legislation.

BALANCE OF TRADE.

I think it is universally recognized as a fundamental proposition that the individual or the country that constantly or habitually produces and sells more than it buys and consumes will grow prosperous and rich. The converse of the proposition is, necessarily, equally true.

For 16 years this country had enjoyed a balance of trade varying from over $400,000,000 to approximately $700,000,000 annually. The last year that we had experienced an adverse balance of trade followed the election of a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress 20 years before. During the month of November, 1912, which witnessed the success of the Democratic Party at the polls, we purchased abroad merchandise aggregating $153,094,898 and sold abroad merchandise aggregating $279,244,191, leaving a balance of trade in our favor for that month in the sum of $126,149,293.

Let us now see what became of this stupendous trade balance existing at the time of the defeat of the Republican Party. With the convening of Congress in December, 1912, a Democratic Ways and Means Committee promptly set about to prepare for the revision of the tariff. That committee pursued its work industriously during that entire session of Congress, and with the close of the Sixty-second Congress and the inauguration of the present Executive, a special session of Congress was called with that end in view. The work was continued throughout the summer, which finally resulted in the passage of the Underwood bill. But no sooner had the election of 1912 passed and work upon the Underwood bill begun than a period of uncertainty and want of confidence became evident. Business was depressed and opportunity for labor became restricted. The output of factories was reduced, and this condition continued throughout the year.

The balance of trade so strong in November, 1912, began to decline until in November, 1913, it was reduced to $97,333,856. The Underwood law became generally effective October 4, 1913. Not all of its provisions, however, became effective at that date. Some of the provisions did not take effect until November 1; others on December 1; and still others, notably Schedule K, the wool schedule, on January 1, 1914. The reduced duties of the sugar schedule did not take effect until March 1, 1914, and the provision for free sugar will not take effect until May, 1916. Following the enactment of the Underwood law the country witnessed not only continued but increased business depression. The balance of trade continued to decline until in January, 1914, it was reduced to $49,713,394.

I have prepared and will ask leave to insert in the RECORD at this point a number of tables containing groups of figures showing the comparative increase of imports over exports and the decline in our balance of trade monthly since the Underwood law became in force. Speaking in round numbers, in January, as I have said, our balance was $49,000,000; in February that balance decreased to $23,000,000; in March, a further decrease to $4,000,000. In April our enormous balance of trade had entirely disappeared, and the record showed a balance against us for that month of more than $11,000,000. The balance of trade has continued against us month by month since that time.

May, 1914	63,629,128
June, 1914	32,842,561
Total loss, 3 months	161,437,553

It will be noted from these figures that the year ending June 30, 1914, as compared with the year 1913 showed an increase of imports of more than $81,000,000 combined with a decrease of exports of more than $101,000,000, thus indicating a total loss of commerce of more than $182,000,000, notwithstanding the fact that the Underwood law had been in force only three-fourths of that time, and as to certain schedules only one-half that time. It is further significant to note that of this $182,000,000 loss in foreign trade about $161,500,000 occurred during the months of April, May, and June of this year.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Those three months were before there was any war in Europe or any thought of war, were they not?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

This stupendous decrease in the volume of our foreign trade and the adverse balance do not, however, indicate the entire significance of the effect of the present tariff law. Its effect upon the volume of our trade is important, but even more so is its effect upon particular classes of imports and exports. Foreign trade is sensitive, and will invariably follow the line of least resistance. This being true, the revenue-tariff system in general, and the present law in particular, is calculated to affect injuriously two great classes of our citizens more than any others. The wage-earning classes and the agricultural classes are the direct recipients of the shock of this adverse balance of trade.

LABOR.

The American laboring man now witnesses the product of his labor offered and sold to the consumers of his own country in direct competition with like and competing commodities produced in Europe and elsewhere abroad as a result of labor which receives a wage varying from 25 to 50 per cent of the wage which he receives. Not only this, but he sees the product of his labor brought in direct competition with the product of classes of labor in Europe and elsewhere which, under the laws of this country, he is no longer required to meet to any considerable extent here. Into our ports from abroad is coming the product of child labor, underpaid female labor, pauper labor, and prison labor of Europe and Asia. True, we have undertaken to exclude a portion of these products, but experience demonstrates that such legal provisions are practically futile. There is no way by which the man in the customhouse in an American port can determine what class of labor entered into the production and manufacture of the merchandise offered for entry.

I invite the attention of the House to a few statistics taken from the Summary of Commerce and Finance, issued by the Department of Commerce. I do this in order that Members may see upon what classes of our productions foreign competition impinges most directly and strongly. Comparing the period of January to June, inclusive, 1913, with 1914 the statistics show with respect to the free list that imports of foodstuffs and food animals in crude condition increased from $80,000,000, in round numbers, to $102,000,000, 27 per cent; that imports of foodstuffs partly and wholly manufactured increased from $3,954,000 to more than $24,570,000, 500 per cent; that imports of manufactures for further use in manufacturing—the American manufacturers' material—increased from $91,000,000 to $102,000,000, or only 12 per cent; while manufactures ready for consumption increased from $32,000,000 to $60,000,000, or 90 per cent.

The comparative increase of importations of dutiable articles is not so great as those upon the free list. Analysis of these increases clearly indicates that the provisions of the law as framed and the duties as laid are calculated to permit importation into this country foreign products freely or with some restriction as the particular product may or may not embody a large per cent of labor. In other words, the manufactures ready for consumption, and which contain the full complement of cheap foreign labor, come to our ports more freely and increase at a greater ratio than partially manufactured products which contain a smaller amount of labor.

The reason for this is clear. The product of the foreign factory imported into this country represents in value about 10 to 15 per cent of so-called raw material and about 85 to 90 per cent of labor, measured by the American standard. The finished product when imported must be sold in the American market in competition with like commodities produced here and at the same price. The American standard of wage varies from two to five or six times that of the foreign wage. The man abroad who has entirely completed his product with cheap labor can pay transportation and meet American competition more effectually than the man who has only partially completed it, for the latter's product must be finished ready for consumption with American labor paid at the higher rate. The result of this economic law is that the foreigner with a completed product ready for consumption seeks our market more readily than any other, for he receives in his profit the full difference of the labor price, while the man with the partially manufactured product receives only a part. This result is fully substantiated by our experience under the present law. Under that law imports of partially manufactured articles increased only about 12 per cent, while imports of wholly manufactured articles increased about 90 per cent. The increase, however, whether in the greater or lesser degree, deprived American labor of just that much work.

In our loss of foreign trade during the last year, amounting to more than $182,000,000, approximately $165,000,000 in wages was lost to the laboring men of this country. The old contention that American labor is reimbursed for this loss by the export of his domestic product can not be urged in this case, for our imports have not only increased, but our exports have decreased. The foreigner seems to have gotten the advantage both coming and going. This fully explains the phenomenon of more than 3,000,000 laboring men being out of employment in this country during a considerable portion of the past year.

Let us suppose the relaxation of our immigration laws to such an extent as would permit the bringing in of foreign contract labor sufficient to permit that labor, working for the wages which it now receives abroad, to produce in this country products aggregating $161,000,000 within the space of three months. With what equanimity do you think the American laboring man would look upon such a policy? With what satisfaction do you think he would enjoy that kind of competition? To ask these questions is to answer them. Such a condition would not be tolerated. But how much better is it for the American laboring man to have the same amount of product made abroad brought free into the American market and offered in competition with his product? The only difference is that in the first case the poorly paid imported foreign labor would spend a portion or all of their money here, and in the second instance all of their wages would be spent abroad. We prohibit the direct importation of foreign cheap contract labor as a protection to our own wage earners. Why should we not at least reasonably restrict the importation of the product of cheap foreign labor when it results in competition equally severe?

In order to illustrate the kind of competition that American labor is facing under a policy of free importation of the product of foreign labor, I ask leave to insert a number of tables of statistics showing the comparative wages received by American and foreign workmen in the various trades and arts.

One of the last acts of the last Republican administration was the approval by President Taft, on March 4, 1913, of the law establishing a Department of Labor and making its chief officer a member of the President's Cabinet, under the designation of Secretary of Labor. That department took over the old Bureau of Labor from the Department of Commerce and Labor, created by the Republican Party more than 10 years before. The function of this department is accumulating information, both in this country and abroad, which may be valuable both in the framing of legislation and keeping those engaged in the various occupations of the country in touch with world conditions. In other words, this department of the Government means protection to American labor. It has always been the policy of the Republican Party to protect labor. This has been accomplished by the maintenance of laws restricting and regulating immigration and prohibiting the bringing in of foreign contract labor. In this way American labor has been relieved in large measure from unfair and oppressive competition. The Republican Party, recognizing that unfair competition was oppressive to the laboring classes of this country, has barred the way to that competition without regard to the particular form under which it might appear. The tendency of unfair and oppressive labor competition is to reduce wages and minimize opportunity for employment. It is immaterial whether we bring in the alien laborer under contract to perform the service here or whether we permit him to perform that service and bring into our market without restriction the product of his labor. The result in either case is the same. The Republican Party has therefore stood for policies which restricted the bringing in of products the result of cheap labor abroad. Men may say that the bringing into this country of two hundred or three hundred million dollars' worth of foreign products ready for consumption tends to reduce the cost of living by cheapening that product; but before that argument will be accepted as sufficient they must prove that the 90 to 95 per cent of cheap foreign labor that enters into that product has no influence upon the standard of wages of American workmen or the amount of work available for them in this country.

TARIFF AND THE FARMER.

I have pointed out what, in my opinion, is the effect of the Democratic system of levying import duties and the tendency of the existing tariff law in its effect upon the wage earners of the country. Pursuing another phase of this, to my mind, fallacious system, I ask the attention of the House while I advert to its effect upon the other great class of our citizens to which I have referred. There are now estimated to be more than six and a half million farms in the United States. Upon these farms reside and are employed approximately 30,000,000 of our people. These people have invested in farm property more than $45,000,000,000. These farms produce annually commodities approximating $10,000,000,000 in value. The possibilities of increased cultivation and production of our agricultural lands is beyond any safe conjecture.

If there is, or has been, any doubt that the happiness, prosperity, and safety of the whole American people rests upon the prosperity and material wealth of the American farmer, that doubt ought to be effectually dispelled by the evident peril of hunger and starvation which now confronts the warring nations of Europe.

If the farmers of this country are to be strong and prosperous, they must not only have means of production and transportation but they must have markets—constant, sure, and dependable markets. And the most dependable market which the American farmer can have is the market which the needs and desires of 100,000,000 active, busy American people create. The market abroad is of course desirable; it permits us to dispose of our surplus and augments our national wealth; and we should be always prepared to redeem our share of its advantages. But the foreign market is not constant and our competition is ever increasing. If we permit our home market to languish, or by glutting it with foreign product discourage and render unprofitable the pursuit of agriculture at home, we weaken that great industry, we diminish that essential national resource, and we imperil the prosperity of the entire country. Give the American farmer his own market and he will by the streugth of his own industry take care of himself in the markets of those countries that have less than enough.

It is a fallacious theory that you advance when you say that when our surplus is small by reason of poor crop or calamitous epidemic that the grain and meat product of foreign countries should be without restriction thrown upon our markets to beat down the price of the husbandman's meager store. The farmer is entitled to the poor advantage of the incident of the lean year. He has devoted the full measure of toil. He has incurred the full measure of expense. He has sustained the loss of the yield or the herd's increase. Would you still further oppress him by defeating the profit upon the little that remains? He does not do so with you who manufacture and produce the things which he has to buy. When the supply is short, he pays the price. It will not do to say that you have also cleared his way to the foreign market, for it has now been demonstrated that the importer and the middleman absorb the difference before it reaches him.

I said there were six and a half million farms in this country. But groups of figures invoke small conception of the significance of this fact. And I fear that we of this period too often obscure our appreciation not only of what these farms have cost, but of their great influence in the development of the country. These farms represent the life labor of all the generations in the different agricultural sections of the country. Their present value no longer bears any approximate relation to virgin soil either here or elsewhere. They have become the improved and developed equipment of a great modern people. Not only that, but they have equipped and developed themselves and the country. Upon agriculture was imposed the great burden of netting our country with railways, and the product of the farm and the commodities consumed by the farmer and those dependent upon him have contributed more to their maintenance and development than any other phase of our industrial life. Upon the farmer has been imposed the burden of building the stupendous grain, stock, and meat market facilities of the country. Many hundreds of millions of dollars have been absorbed from the farmer's product to build the vast elevator storage systems; stockyards, large and small, packing houses, and meat-storage plants, all in the last analysis have been made a charge upon agriculture. I know there are those who will dispute this and say that the cost has been passed along to the ultimate consumer. This may be true theoretically, but it is not actually so in this instance. When we consider the farmer's price for his own product as compared with the price paid by the ultimate consumer for the same product, and when we familiarize ourselves with the methods that have prevailed in the grain and stock markets of the country, we are convinced that the farmer has had to a considerable degree his prices fixed for him, irrespective of the general law of supply and demand of the country. Combination and manipulation have undoubtedly deprived the farmer of a material part of his legitimate profit; enough, I believe, during the last 30 or 40 years to have built all of the market equipment of the United States. There is now imposed upon the farms of the United States another great task, that of netting the whole country with a finer mesh of improved highways. The good-roads movement is entitled to the support of all, but the burden will fall upon the farms.

Now, in view of all that the farmer has done in the past and all that is expected from him in the future, I, for one, believe he is entitled to an even start and a fair chance in the race with the other industrial classes of the country. I do not believe he ought to be discriminated against. I believe, however, that he is discriminated against as compared with many classes engaged in other pursuits; and especially do I believe that he is treated unjustly with respect to the conditions of foreign competition imposed upon him.

Substantially everything that the farmer produces, under the existing tariff law, is on the free list. There is a small countervailing duty on wheat which our greatest, nearest, and most dangerous competitor can remove at will, and a duty of 6 cents per bushel on oats. Sugar is not yet, but soon will be, on the free list. We are told that the farmer does not need protection; that by teaching improved agricultural methods he will be able to outstrip all competitors in the markets at home and abroad. In the meantime, some way or other, he will get along. We are told that protection does not benefit the farmer, anyway; that the foreign market fixes his price and that import duties collected at the border will not increase that price. Well, if that be true, any tariff would be a tariff for revenue, and we are now losing the revenue. If that be true, what becomes of the argument for a reduction of the cost of living?

I do not believe that it is true. I believe that free trade reduces the price of the American farmer's product, and that as against competition in his home market the foreign price has lost much of its influence; that while it equalizes values abroad, under the dissimilarity of conditions between exporting countries at home, its influence is very largely neutralized before it reaches the producer.

I concede that where two countries are similarly situated, each producing a surplus and each having equal facilities and access to the controlling foreign market for that surplus, the foreign market will substantially equalize the price for the commodity in the two exporting countries, and that a tariff between them would not materially affect the price. But in that case there would be little or no commerce between them in the given commodities.

But, on the other hand, where the two countries are not similarly situated, one having vastly superior facilities for reaching the foreign market, in that case the foreign price will not equalize prices in the producing countries, but the one favorably situated will take and hold an advantage in the export market; and if the country with the poor facilities and less easy access to the foreign market is adjacent to the other country and there is no impeding obstacle, it will seek the market of that country rather than the foreign market, and competition will ensue and the price will go down.

There is a material difference between competition at home at or near the point of production and competition in a foreign market affecting only your surplus. The producers of agricultural commodities are a numerous class; they can not effectively organize, and to glut their market invariably depresses the price.

We can test this matter, however, by our own experience. Whenever this country has produced a large surplus of cereals the price at home has gone down, and the larger our surplus the more the price has declined. This has been true even though the world supply of the commodity has not materially increased. A large world supply, of course, tends to decrease the price; a world shortage tends to increase the price. But given two years with the world's supply equal our farm price has always responded to conditions at home. A short crop has increased the price, and a large crop has lowered the price.

The principle to which I have referred is exemplified in the case of the United States and Canada. Both of these countries are great producers of cereals, both usually having a surplus. In the past that surplus has been largely sold in a common market abroad, but the farm price of American grain has been higher than the farm price of Canadian grain.

I have studied the market conditions and methods of these two countries with some degree of care, and can arrive at no other conclusion than that the market conditions and facilities of the United States are very much superior to those of Canada and that we have in the past reaped the advantage of this superiority and may continue to do so by restricting the importation of the Canadian products into our markets.

Western Canada in 1912 sowed more than 10,000,000 acres of wheat, about 5,000,000 acres of oats, as well as large quantities of barley, flax, and other cereals. Her yield exceeds that of the United States. Her soil is rich and fertile. Her land, commercially speaking, is low in value compared with land in the United States, so that farms may be improved and operated with small capital.

In 1912 the estimated amount of wheat produced in the United States was 730,267,000 bushels; oats, 1,418,337,000 bushels. The estimated production of Canadian Provinces for the same year was: Wheat, 205,682,000 bushels; oats, 381,502,000 bushels. It will be observed that Canada's production of wheat and oats was nearly one-third that of the United States, but it must be recalled that Canada's production is increasing by leaps and bounds.

Statistics from the Department of Agriculture show for the year 1913 an average wheat yield in the United States to be 15.2 bushels per acre; average for the past five years, 14.66 bushels per acre. Yield of oats, 1913, average, 29.2 bushels per acre; for the past five years, 30.58 bushels per acre.

The census statistics of Canada for the last year available (1912) show an average yield of spring wheat of 21 bushels per acre; average yield of oats, 41 bushels per acre.

Statistics of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1909, the last available figures, show an average cost of production of wheat in the United States to be $7.85 per acre, exclusive of rent, and $11.15 per acre including rent; oats, $7.13 per acre, exclusive of rent, and $10.91 per acre including rent.

Canadian statistics show for 1911 an average cost of production of wheat of $10.19 per acre, exclusive of rent, and $12.87 including rent; oats, $9.02 per acre, exclusive of rent, and $12.61 including rent.

It must be borne in mind, however, that these figures are based upon the experience of eastern Canada, where intensive farming prevails. There were no accurate figures available for western Canada at that date. It must be recalled that the cost of production in Canada is decreasing as the country develops. Until the last two or three years teams, implements, seed, labor, and all supplies were high in western Canada. That condition is becoming, in a measure, ameliorated. On the other hand, the cost of production in the United States is constantly increasing. Increase of rentals, labor, and other factors have materially increased the cost of production of grain grown in the United States since 1909. It is safe to say that at the present time the cost of production of wheat, oats, and other cereals in Canada, exclusive of rent, is much lower than in the United States; so that when we consider the comparative value of land and Canada's larger yield, we find the farmer of the United States at a marked disadvantage as to cost of production compared with the Canadian farmer.

Canada, however, has many drawbacks as compared with the United States. Among them are the absence of a large home market, milling, transportation, and export market facilities. Time, capital, and interest charges also enter into the equation. These obstacles prevent Canada reaching foreign markets quickly and economically and result in her seeking the market of the United States, even though it is a surplus country.

The methods of marketing American and Canadian grain differ according to the conditions of the two countries. In the United States grain first moves from the farm to the local market. Passing through the country elevator it proceeds to the great primary markets of the country. At the primary market it is cleaned and subjected to a variety of different treatments, graded and finally distributed to the consuming centers and territory. That portion of the grain that is fit and desirable for export passes through the primary market to the great export points where it again goes into storage and at the proper time moves by water to the surplus market abroad. Our system of home markets is a triple one. First, the local points with their untold number of small units, the country elevators; second, the primary market, having the greatest storage capacity of all, for these markets must receive practically all of the grain, or at least a very large portion of it; third, the export point, the storage capacity of which is large, but not nearly equal to that of the primary market. The total storage capacity of the grain centers of the United States, including primary and export markets, aggregates more than 218,000,000 bushels. Grain is sold for export at all of these markets, and actually exported from nearly all of them. The seaboard export markets alone of the United States have more than 60,000,000 bushels capacity as compared with Canada's 6,000,000 bushels. There are no statistics as to the aggregate storage capacity of the country elevators of the United States. Taking the best factors I can obtain I have estimated the capacity at 1,000,000,000 bushels. These figures probably fall short, however.

Canada's total storage capacity, including all country elevators on all lines of railroad, aggregates only 127,000,000 bushels. Only about 22,000,000 of this aggregate is comprised within her grain centers. The bulk of Canada's grain, unlike that of the United States, is stored in the country at local points. The necessity for this practice lies in the lack of transportation facilities. Canada relies largely upon water transportation through the Great Lakes and her rivers and canals. Navigation of these waters closes early in December each year and remains closed until about the middle of April. This closed period of navigation extends to and includes Quebec. Quebec, however, is not a grain market and has no storage capacity. Montreal is the last grain market upon the waters enumerated. It is therefore evident that Canada can export little grain during the winter months, her only available open harbor during the winter being Vancouver, except through the United States.

With the permission of the House, I will insert at this point two tables showing the total grain storage capacity of Canada by Provinces and the primary and export market capacity of the United States.

CANADA—CAPACITY OF ELEVATORS IN PROVINCES.

In the light of these transportation and market facilities and conditions of Canada and the United States, I invite the attention of the House to the effect which the Underwood law has had upon importation of farm products into the United States. The Underwood law had been in force nine months with the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. I therefore take that period for comparison with the nine months ending June 30, 1913. Substantially all of the wheat and oats imported into the United States came from Canada. During the nine months ending June 30, 1913, there was imported into the United States wheat aggregating 472,385 bushels, less than half a million. During the nine months ending June 30, 1914, there was imported into the United States wheat aggregating 1,971,430 bushels, almost 2,000,000, or an increase of substantially 300 per cent. During the same period in 1913 there was imported into the United States oats aggregating 79,966 bushels; during that period for 1914 there was imported into the United States oats aggregating 22,276,137 bushels.

What is true of importations of wheat and oats and other cereals from Canada is true of corn imported from Argentina. Substantially all of our corn importations come from Argentina. For the nine months ending June 30, 1913, there had been imported into this country corn aggregating 274,733 bushels, or slightly more than a quarter of a million. During the nine months ending June 30, 1914, there was imported into this country corn aggregating 11,843,166 bushels, or approximately forty times that of the like previous period.

Now, it must be considered that this marvelous increase of importation of wheat, oats, and corn took place immediately after the passage of the present law. No intervening time elapsed for preparation by Canada or Argentina, and we had been pursuing a policy in the past that very much restricted importation of grain and grain products from these countries. If, however, these countries understand that it is to be the permanent policy of this country to admit these products substantially free, or with very low duties, and that they are to have access to the markets of the United States, they will prepare for additional importation. Especially will it tend to develop rapidly western Canada, and we may look for a continued increase of marketing of Canadian grain in the United States.

The importation of foreign grain into our primary markets exerts its influence very quickly not only upon the value of the grain imported, but of all the grain in this country. This fact is illustrated strikingly in the importation of oats for the periods I have mentioned. The 1913 importations of substantially 70,900 bushels showed a value of more than $37,500, or substantially 47 cents per bushel, import price. The 22,276,000 bushels imported in 1914 showed a value of $7,882,000, or substantially 33 cents per bushel, import price. Now, the statistics compiled by the Department of Agriculture for 1909, which I have pointed out are much too low at the present time, show the average cost of production of oats in this country, exclusive of rent, to be 20 cents per bushel, and, including rent, 31 cents per bushel. It would be safe to add 5 cents per bushel to each of these sets of figures under present conditions. This decline of 14 cents per bushel on oats was in the face of the fact that our crop had decreased from 1,418,000,000 bushels in 1912 to 1,121,000,000 bushels in 1913 and that Canada's crop had only increased 339,000 bushels and the entire world's yield had only increased 4 per cent.

The great bulk of our oats are thrashed from the stack. They are permitted to go through the sweat either in the stack or in the bin. They do not reach the primary markets until November, December, and January. The Canadian oats are thrashed from the shock, and such portion of them as can get access to our markets are shipped immediately. Beginning with October and continuing through November, December, and January, the Canadian oats shipments last year were concentrated upon our markets just at the time our home oats were being delivered. This simply proves that with continued importation of oats from Canada into our markets oats can no longer be produced at a profit in the United States. Oats has always been the second crop of importance in the State of Iowa. We find it necessary to raise a large acreage of oats in order to change our corn land, and it is an important factor with the Iowa farmer whether he can raise oats at a reasonable profit or at a loss.

The admission of corn from Argentina will not, of course, have so serious an effect upon our markets here as the admission of wheat and oats from Canada. However, Argentina's competition in corn has the same tendency. We must constantly bear in mind that Canada has but about 20,000,000 acres under cultivation, whereas she has that many acres ready for the plow and which will also be brought into cultivation as fast as her resources and population permit of its development. Argentina has equal advantages so far as territory is concerned. Her corn production is merely in its infancy. Her lands available and suitable for the production of corn are very extensive and capable of multiplying her present production a great many times. The question for the farmer of the United States to determine is whether it is best for him that this country should make permanent its present policy of admitting agricultural products of those other countries to our markets free; whether it will affect the American farmer favorably or unfavorably to give to the foreign producer equal advantages in our home market and equal access to all of the transportation and market facilities which have been developed and paid for by the American farmer.

The increase of importation of agricultural products does not stop with cereals. During the period of nine months ending June 30, 1913, we imported into this country cattle aggregating 366,130 head. During the like period ending June 30, 1914, we imported 725,584 head, or substantially double the number of the previous period. The importation of sheep for the same periods increased from 13,000 to 220,000; meats from a little more than half a million to nearly 200,000,000 pounds; eggs from less than a million to nearly 6,000,000 dozens. With the permission of the House, I will insert a table illustrating the increase of importations during the periods mentioned, covering 25 of the principal products of the farm.

[1] Eggs, quantity and value for 9 months estimated as three-fourths quantity and value for whole year ending June 30, 1913.

The foregoing table, giving the results of the Underwood law for the first nine months after its enactment will indicate how alert other nations are for markets and how ready they will be to take advantage of the market afforded by the hundred million population of the United States. And while we examine the tabulated results touching these agricultural commodities we must not lose sight of the fact that importations of manufactures ready for consumption have increased in almost an equal ratio.

A very important factor in the consideration of importations of corn from Argentina is the matter of water-transportation rates. The Argentina corn-producing territory is very accessible to seaboard; therefore the cost of transporting the commodity to the consuming centers of the United States has a very material influence upon the competition. During last March I made quite an extensive investigation touching the matter of rates upon corn from Argentina to American ports, also as to the volume of importations at that time and the ports receiving the same and the particular industries using Argentina corn at that time. In a communication which I received March 6, 1914, from the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it is stated:

> The last consignment of corn from Argentina was shipped at the rate of 8 shillings per ton to Atlantic seaport points. * * * Some of the rates from American to European ports are at present as follows:
>
> Boston to Liverpool, 2½ cents a bushel.
> New York to Liverpool, 2½ cents a bushel.
> New York to Rotterdam, 4 cents a bushel.
> New York to Hamburg, 4½ cents a bushel.
> New York to Antwerp, 3½ cents a bushel.
> New York to Copenhagen, 5½ cents a bushel.
> New York to London and Manchester, 3½ cents a bushel.
> New York to Glasgow, 4 cents a bushel.

Another communication of March 7, giving advices from Boston, states:

> Shipments of corn from Argentina to this country are usually made in tramp steamers and generally shipped in sacks. The latest rates are in the neighborhood of 7s. 6d. to 8s. per ton from Argentina to American ports, and were substantially the same from Argentina to European ports * * * Rates from our Atlantic seaboard to European ports at the present time vary from about 2 cents per bushel of 60 pounds to Liverpool up to about 5 cents per bushel to other United Kingdom ports, and the rates to continental ports vary from about 3½ cents per bushel of 60 pounds to Antwerp and Rotterdam up to about 7½ cents per bushel to some of the Mediterranean and French ports. These rates are by the regular lines of steamers. Outside steamers can be chartered at equal to about 4½ to 5 cents per bushel to the cheaper ports, and rates to Mediterranean and French ports a little under those in effect via the regular lines.

Under communication of March 11, 1914, containing advices from Baltimore, it is stated:

> That about 8,000,000 bushels of Argentine grain have been brought to our American ports; that some interior distribution has been made, but that the greater portion of it has been used by the Corn Products Co., of New York.

Under communication of date, March 16, I have advices from Galveston, Tex., as follows:

> This is the first season within which corn has been imported from Argentina through the port of Galveston, and no other kind of grain from Argentina has reached this port. The importation of this season was due largely to shortage of the corn crop in Texas, resulting from drought. The production of corn in Texas is limited because, due to climatic conditions, they are unable to preserve a large crop without having suffered ravages of the corn weevil, which begins its operations in the winter and spring months. When they have surplus, it is exported, because of the fact that it will not keep. Ten cargoes of corn have been received from Argentina at Galveston, all in tramp ships, consigned to the Rosenbaum Grain Co., etc. * * * The freight charges varied on these shipments from 7 shillings to 12 shillings 6 pence per ton of 2,240 pounds.

In early November, 1913, Kansas City corn was worth about 84 or 85 cents per bushel delivered at south Texas points. The first cargo of Argentine corn was offered at 76½ cents per bushel free on board cars at Galveston. The maximum freight rate from Galveston to Texas points was about 7 cents per bushel, which made the Argentine corn salable at about 83½ cents. The Argentine corn is offered now in Galveston at 69½ cents free on board cars.

In a communication under date of March 24, bringing advices from New York, it is stated:

The importations of Argentine corn at the port of New York in the latter part of 1913 and the early part of 1914 were as follows: September, 420,000 bushels; October, 664,500 bushels; November, 1,103,900 bushels; December, 1,493,100 bushels; January, 1,561,300 bushels; February, 728,200 bushels. The rates changed from 15 shillings in September, 1913, to 8 shillings in February, 1914. The ocean rates on grain from New York to European ports are stated to be as follows: To Liverpool, 1½ pence; London, 1¾ pence; Glasgow, 1½ and 1¾ pence; Bremen and Hamburg, 30 pfennig.

It is quite evident from the experience of the last nine months that importation of Argentine corn into the United States was made possible entirely by the removal of the duty. It is further evident that exporters of Argentine corn recognize the American market as a very desirable one, and considering the very low rates of water transportation that have prevailed, it enables the importers of Argentine corn to distribute that product throughout the eastern consuming centers of the United States at a great advantage over the producers in the Mississippi Valley. An average rate of transportation from Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, South Dakota, and Missouri to New York and other eastern points approximates 35 cents per hundredweight. This is very much in excess of the cost of laying down Argentine corn at the same points.

The existing law not only gives the Argentine farmer the advantage of his cheap lands but also of cheap water transportation. With respect to the importations at New York, I have pointed out that the commodity was almost entirely consumed by the Corn Products Co., a Standard Oil concern. The question now occurs, Who got the benefit of the importation? I think no one will contend that the Corn Products Co. has reduced the price to the consumer upon any of its products. It is evident that the Government has lost revenue that might have been received through the levying of a reasonable tariff. It would seem, therefore, that in this instance the only party to be benefited was the Corn Products Co.

An examination of the railway tariffs will disclose that the rates from a very large portion of the wheat and oat producing section of western Canada to the primary market at Minneapolis are lower than from a large portion of Iowa, Nebraska, and South Dakota. But inasmuch as our Interstate Commerce Commission has no power to control or regulate the rates upon Canadian railways or investigate the facts concerning those rates, there will always remain an element of uncertainty as to just what the Canadian traffic is bearing in that respect.

Earlier in my remarks I called your attention to the effect of Canadian importation upon the price of oats in our domestic market. Permit me now to call your attention to the general effect of Canadian importation upon other commodities. The great agricultural staples of Canada are wheat, oats, barley, and flaxseed. All of these commodities now come freely upon our market. I will ask permission, therefore, to insert at this point a short table compiled from the statistics contained in Farmers' Bulletin No. 611, issued July 21, 1914, by the Department of Agriculture. This table gives the average price at the local markets of the United States of various farm commodities on July 1, 1914, as compared with the five years' average of that date, and also the range of prices for June, 1914, as compared with June, 1912.

An examination of these tables will clearly refute many of the wild statements that have been disseminated throughout the country as to the relation of present prices to prices in the past. Prices of farm products at the present time are high in spite of the influence of the importation of foreign product. Last year we experienced a short crop in many sections of the country, and especially was this true of corn. The present range of prices of course is dominated by the war in Europe. We have, in fact, had abnormal conditions since the first of the year. Delicate international conditions have existed in Europe. With the opening of the Balkan war a strained condition existed among European nations which continued up to the time of the opening of the present conflict. During this period of time the foreign market for food products has been active. England, France, and Germany, as well as other European nations, have been laying in a surplus store. These conditions have all tended to strengthen the demand and increase the price of farm products in the United States. Notwithstanding these conditions, however, prices of substantially all farm products ranged lower this year up to the 1st of July than in 1912. On July 1 the index figure of crop prices, while higher than a year ago, was 14 per cent lower than on July 1, 1912. I call attention to these facts because I have heard it frequently claimed that farm prices during the first six months of the present year were much higher than in previous years. The particular matter to which I desire to direct attention in this connection is importations from the Canadian Provinces and Argentina. One of the questions at least that the western farmer has to consider is whether unrestricted or practically unrestricted importation of farm products from Canada is conducive to his welfare or whether it tends in the opposite direction, whether Canadian competition is a thing to be invited because it is calculated to enhance his prosperity or whether we should restrict that competition with a view to giving the American farmer the benefit of the American market and to encourage the agricultural industries of the country. What is true in the case of Canada as applied to wheat, oats, barley, flax, and other cereals is equally true as applied to the unrestricted importation of corn from Argentina. It may take a little longer time before the importations of corn will seriously affect our home market, but to the extent of the ability of that country to import corn its tendency will be to lower the price of the American product and, unless conditions change, without benefiting the ultimate consumer of that product.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the lateness of the hour, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-nine Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 14233, found itself without a quorum, the Chair had caused the roll to be called, and 236 Members had answered to their names, and he therewith presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate having expired, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, and to lease such lands or the deposits of coal contained therein, as hereafter provided, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to established settlements of existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of the public lands: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, as herein provided, with a view to facilitating development and without awaiting said surveys, make such awards of leases in the coal fields in Alaska as he may deem advisable and under such regulations as he may prescribe; the locations of such leases shall be distinctly marked upon the ground under his direction, so that their boundaries can be readily traced.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FERRIS. Has the gentleman an amendment which he desires to offer?

Mr. STAFFORD. I prefer to have unanimous consent that amendments may be offered to this section at the next meeting.

Mr. FERRIS. There is no disposition to preclude any gentleman from offering amendments. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution to correct error in H. R. 12045.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 6357. An act to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request:

Mr. VAUGHAN asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4254) to enable the Secretary of War to pay the amount awarded to the Malambo fire claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, and that the same be hereby referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does not that properly belong under the rules to the Committee on Claims?

The SPEAKER. It looks like it on the face of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it a request by the committee or an individual?

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: It involves treaty relations, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs has a House bill of the same tenor. The Committee on Claims wants to get rid of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, has this action been taken by the full Committee on Claims?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Texas if the change of reference is with the consent of the Committee on Claims?

Mr. VAUGHAN. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 1, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15176) granting an increase of pension to Dennis Carroll, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HENRY: A bill (H. R. 18605) for the temporary relief of the cotton growers and producers of agricultural products; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. TOWNER: A bill (H. R. 18606) to amend an act approved February 6, 1905, relating to the issuance of bonds and other matters affecting the Philippine Islands, and to increase the limit of indebtedness as therein provided; to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

By Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 18607) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Paul, Minn.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HAY: A bill (H. R. 18608) to provide for the restoration of retired officers to the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 18609) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to lease for mining purposes certain lands on the Ponca Indian Reservation, Okla.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FREAR: Resolution (H. Res. 613) directing the Committee on the Judiciary of the House to investigate and report what secret or public activities have been undertaken by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress regarding the passage of the rivers and harbors bill; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: A bill (H. R. 18610) for the relief of the Buffalo River Zinc Mining Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 18611) granting an increase of pension to Louise Strassler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURNETT: A bill (H. R. 18612) for the relief of the heirs of Elijah Glass; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CARR: A bill (H. R. 18613) granting a pension to Maria L. Moore; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 18614) granting an increase of pension to Archibald F. Bottoms; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 18615) granting an increase of pension to Joshua D. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 18616) granting an honorable discharge to Thomas McCarthy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LONERGAN: A bill (H. R. 18617) for the relief of William Dixon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MURDOCK: A bill (H. R. 18618) granting an increase of pension to George E. Harris; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NEELEY of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 18619) granting a pension to William W. Peyton; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18620) granting a pension to Edward Sheehan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18621) granting a pension to Allen Sigler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18622) granting a pension to James Kinser; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 18623) granting a pension to John Shanks; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of New York: A bill (H. R. 18624) for the relief of the Lackawanna Steel Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TEN EYCK: A bill (H. R. 18625) for the relief of Anthony Schnell; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WICKERSHAM: A bill (H. R. 18626) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 18627) to correct the military record of George F. Reid and to pay his widow, Isabella Reid, a pension; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FITZHENRY: A bill (H. R. 18628) granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: Petition of the Chautauqua Assembly at Louisiana, Mo., urging adoption of antipolygamy resolution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of Mrs. M. S. McCune and other ladies of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Sulde, Ohio, protesting against the passage of House bill 16804, relative to railroad tracks opposite Sibley Hospital in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BRUCKNER: Petition of the Washington Heights Taxpayers' Association, relative to proposed improvement of the United States ship canal at Spuyten Duyvil; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of District Grand Lodge No. 1, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, against literacy test in immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the National Child Labor Committee, favoring passage of House bill 12292, relative to reform in child labor; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of the American Optical Association, favoring the passage of the Stevens bill, House bill 13305; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Sam S. Brewer, of New York, against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin (by request): Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Fort Atkinson, Wis., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of various manufacturers of Wisconsin relative to importation of chemicals, etc., from foreign countries now at war; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. FRANCIS: Petition of the Methodist Protestant Christian Endeavor Society of Steubenville, Ohio, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. KAHN: Petition of H. L. Judell & Co. and the Retail Cigar Dealers' Association of San Francisco, Cal., protesting against any additional revenue tax on cigars; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of certain citizens of Branford, Conn., in favor of consideration of the woman-suffrage amendment at the present session of Congress; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 1, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 25, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Kern
Bryan	Chilton	Hollis	Lane
Burton	Culberson	Jones	Lea, Tenn.
Camden	Gallinger	Kenyon	Lewis

McCumber	Perkins	Smith, Md.	Vardaman
McLean	Pittman	Smith, Mich.	Walsh
Martin, Va.	Ransdell	Smoot	White
Martine, N. J.	Reed	Sterling	Williams
Nelson	Sheppard	Swanson
O'Gorman	Shively	Thomas
Overman	Simmons	Thornton

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. COLT, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. THOMPSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. CUMMINS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. DILLINGHAM entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. BRADY, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. LEE of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. GRONNA], who will in all probability be absent during the entire week. Therefore I make the statement at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call.

The Senate will pardon the Chair for making a statement just now. For the last three or four days it has been impossible on the part of the Chair to hear responses of Senators to the roll call and the Chair would request Senators when the roll is called to speak out loud. It has been impossible two or three times for the Chair to tell on which side a Senator has voted.

Mr. NELSON. I have here a copy of the decision in the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, recently made in the International Harvester Trust case. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 569.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Was not that decision printed a little while ago?

Mr. NELSON. No; that was a different case. This is a decision that was lately made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. KENYON. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri in the form in which I send it to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] the following proviso:

Provided, That at least 90 days before commencing suit the attorney general of the State has requested the Attorney General of the United States to bring such suit, and such request has not been complied with by the Attorney General of the United States, and said Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to appear and participate in said suit with said attorney general of the State.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as originally proposed by the Senator from Missouri, so that we may have both together?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Missouri proposes to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. That the attorney general of any State may, at the cost of the State, bring suit in the name of the United States to enforce any of the antitrust laws.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri. Does the Senator from Missouri understand that this amendment would in any wise change the jurisdiction of the State courts. That is to say, is it the purpose to allow the attorney general of a State to bring a suit for the enforcement of the antitrust law in the courts of his State?

Mr. REED. I do not think the mere fact that the attorney general brought the suit would in any manner affect the place of bringing the suit. It was not my purpose to in any manner affect that question.

Mr. CUMMINS. At the present time, of course, a suit can only be maintained in the courts of the United States. I think we will all agree that in order to preserve uniformity in the decisions the course heretofore pursued ought to be continued. I was a little fearful that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri might be construed to destroy that exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

Mr. REED. I think not. I think that would require an express provision, and this law, in my judgment, would be given the same construction that is given to many other similar laws. To illustrate, if the Senator will permit me, it is now the law in a great many States that the attorney general may bring suits of ouster, quo warranto proceedings, and so forth, and the primary jurisdiction is vested in him to bring those suits; but it is also frequently provided that the prosecuting attorney may bring such suits in the name of the State. That does not affect the jurisdiction; it does not change the power of the court; it does not vest a court with jurisdiction which did not previously have it; but it simply provides a new way of initiating litigation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not examined it enough to even question the conclusion of the Senator from Missouri, but I had no doubt he had thought about it sufficiently to know whether it by any possibility could have that effect.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Missouri what effect his amendment will have upon section 13 of the bill, which is but section 4 of the act of 1890. Section 13, I repeat, is but a repetition of section 4 of the Sherman law of 1890, changed to meet the fact that circuit courts have been abolished and district courts inaugurated in their stead.

Mr. REED. I think the solitary effect would be this, that whereas section 13 now reads—

That the several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations—

If this section was added section 13 would, in effect, read in this wise:

That it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. In the event the district attorney shall not, within 90 days after he has been requested to bring such proceedings by the attorney general of any State, bring the same, then in that event the attorney general of the State may institute the proceedings.

The sections are not in conflict at all.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to ask the Senator what would be the situation presented and what would be the possible outcome if there should be a diversity of opinion between the attorney general of the State who had instituted the suit and the Attorney General of the United States as to its conduct thereafter? Does not the Senator see that it might bring a conflict of authority as to what ought to be done and some one should have the final say as to what should be the outcome of the suit? For instance, the attorney general of the State might see fit to dismiss the suit and the Attorney General of the United States would say, "No; go ahead with it." Of district attorneys there are—I do not know how many—probably 75 or 100, all over the United States. There is at least one in each State and in some of the States two or three or more, there being one for each district. Does not the Senator think that it is ample to vest the enforcement in the district attorneys and let them be under the general supervision of the Attorney General, whereas if you have the attorney general of the State in addition you have an officer that the Attorney General of the United States can not control, and therefore very probably the Attorney General of the United States might lose control of these suits in some of the cases.

Mr. REED. I am intending to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and I am intending to ask that it be further amended by adding the words "and to control the prosecution," so that the Attorney General would be given the control.

Mr. President, answering the question of the Senator, I will say, of course, if I believed that the Attorney General ought absolutely to control this litigation and should alone be intrusted with the enforcement of all these laws, if I were content with that, I should not have offered this amendment. I am not content with it; I have never been content with it from the day the Sherman law was written unto this hour, and there is not a man in the United States who wants to really enforce those laws who can conscientiously say that he is contented with the enforcement we have had.

In reply to the Senator from West Virginia I will say that if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is accepted as suggested, it amounts simply to this: That the Attorney General can control all litigation; he is given the first right to initiate it, then he is given the opportunity to stop it and to control it; but there is this important difference: If he does not initiate the litigation within 90 days, it can then be initiated by the attorney general of a State; the litigation is there on the books and is before the public. If the Attorney General takes the responsibility of dismissing the litigation, he must do so in view of those circumstances. It is a very different proposition from the present one, which is that nobody can start this litigation except the Attorney General, and he can keep it locked up in his office or locked up in his bosom for any period of time, however long or indefinite.

This amendment gives the power of initiation to the attorneys general of the various States; it puts 46 watchdogs on guard—I use the term "watchdog" respectfully, of course—instead of merely one man. It at the same time will leave in the hands of the Attorney General a complete control of the situation. If he takes the responsibility of dismissing the litigation, he can do so, knowing that he will very likely be criticized if he is wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Missouri, out of abundant caution, an amendment to his proposal. It will be noticed that in section 14, the section in which we extend to anyone injured injunctive relief under the antitrust laws, we say:

SEC. 14. That any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties.

I confess to a little fear that if those words are not in this amendment it might create embarrassment.

Mr. REED. I am willing to accept them.

Mr. CUMMINS. So I suggest that, after the words "United States," in line 3 of the Senator's amendment, there should be inserted "in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties." It will then be in harmony with the language of section 14.

Mr. REED. I accept the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. If the amendments offered by the two Senators from Iowa are agreeable to the Senator from Missouri, I would suggest that they be incorporated in one amendment. Then, we need have but one vote.

Mr. REED. That is what I intend to do.

Now, I desire to accept the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and to further amend the amendment by adding the words at the end of the amendment:

And the Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to control the prosecution.

I ask that the entire amendment shall be stated as modified.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, that simply means that when the Attorney General of the United States is requested by the attorney general of a State to bring a suit under certain facts and circumstances which the attorney general of the State thinks constitute a violation of the antitrust act, if the Attorney General of the United States does not do that, and the attorney general of the State, at the expiration of 90 days, brings that action, the Attorney General of the United States, under the change which the Senator from Missouri now makes in his amendment, may step in and dismiss the suit. I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is not in accordance with my real desire. I want to get this amendment so framed that at least the right of initiation shall be preserved to the States.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is right; but the Attorney General of the United States, having had the opportunity to bring the suit and to control the case by bringing it within 90 days, if he does not do that, and the attorney general of the State brings the suit, the Attorney General of the United States ought not to have the power to dismiss it.

Of course, if the Senator from Missouri puts those words into his amendment, I can not help it; but I think the amendment as at first suggested by him was better.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he takes his seat. Does the Senator from Iowa mean to say that under his amendment there can be a stage in such a suit at which the Attorney General of the United States has no power to control, no power to prosecute, and no power to dismiss? Is it possible he means that?

Mr. KENYON. That is exactly what I mean. The Senator from West Virginia does not mistake the purpose at all. If the Attorney General has had the opportunity to bring a suit and neglects to do so, and the attorney general of a State has investigated the matter and as a result of his investigation brings the suit, he ought to have the right to go ahead and finish with it. The State is paying the cost all the time, and no attorney general of a State would proceed with a suit when it would involve his State in great expense if he had no substantial case; but under the amendment as changed by the Senator from Missouri the Attorney General of the United States would have the right to dismiss the suit.

Mr. CHILTON. In other words, Mr. President, section 13 gives the various United States district attorneys in the States the power, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to enforce this law, and the amendment would give the attorneys general of the States a greater power than we give to the regularly appointed and employed counsel of the United States in the various districts. It seems to me that this is not only an innovation but a most dangerous experiment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Missouri will not make the change which he has intimated he desires to make. It seems to me that the effect of the change will be to nullify in all practical effect the amendment which he has proposed and with which I am in entire accord. I should like to call his attention to the fact that his amendment provides that the prosecutions contemplated will be brought at the expense of the States. It strikes me that if after a suit is instituted by the attorney general of a State you then give the power to the Attorney General of the United States to control the case and to manage it, you have practically nullified the purpose sought to be obtained, and that no attorney general of a State would want to get his State involved in a case the control of which he would absolutely lose.

There can be no objection, in my judgment, on the part of the Attorney General of the United States to the attorney general of a State having control, because before the attorney general of a State can get control or can institute proceedings he must give the Attorney General of the United States 90 days' notice, and the Attorney General of the United States during that time has it within his power to go ahead; but when he fails to do so and the attorney general of the State, at the expense of the State, commences the suit, then it seems to me that it is not right to take the control of that case away from the attorney general of the State.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, answering the Senator, I would be very willing——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the object sought by the Senator from Missouri is to insure prosecutions under the antitrust laws. If 90 days elapse, the Attorney General of the United States is entirely out of the affair if the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska prevails, and the attorney general of a State may assume jurisdiction and authority over the case, and from that moment the Attorney General of the United States has no influence or authority over the proceeding. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri what Attorney General of the United States, who has a proper motive in refusing to take the initiative, would consent to waive jurisdiction over a case by allowing the 90-day period to elapse?

If the Senator from Missouri were Attorney General of the United States, and felt that a prosecution of a given cause under this act was not desirable at the time proposed, would he yield to a State officer the power he would not exercise himself? The Senator from Missouri, as such Attorney General, would not remain quiet and permit any other authority to institute proceedings, and thus hamper his general plan of proceedings. He can begin the case very easily by filing the first paper and get control of the case, thus depriving the State of the power to move in the matter. It seems to me that the amendment is calculated to add confusion and lack of symmetry and purpose to the work of the Department of Justice, which has been specially created for this work. In a sense the Attorney General of the United States is a semijudicial officer, and his authority can not be ruthlessly disregarded without a reflection upon his title.

If I were Attorney General of the United States and the attorney general of the State of Missouri threatened to institute suit, and I had a good reason for not acquiescing in his action, I should take charge of that litigation and hold it in statu quo until I felt that it was proper and expedient to proceed, thus rendering the amendment of no potency whatever.

There ought to be some way of enforcing obedience of the antitrust laws, but I seriously question whether the method proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be found to be practicable in that regard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator address the question to me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I presume it is not a question.

Mr. REED. I have only a few minutes left, but if I may answer in the Senator's time, I should be very glad to reply now; otherwise I will wait until I may have another opportunity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would be very glad if the Senator would take the time I have left.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I was asked a question by the Senator from Nebraska, and then a question, I take it, was propounded by the Senator from Michigan. If the Senator from Colorado will wait a moment, I will yield to him.

Answering both the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Michigan, I desire to say, first, that I recognize the fact that the amendment last suggested by me will, of course, weaken the power of the attorneys general of the States; I recognize the fact that the Attorney General of the United States could, after litigation had been initiated by them, go into court and stop it; but he would have to take the responsibility of going into court and stopping a case brought by the legal representative of a great State, and he would hesitate about doing that. Therefore I think there will still be left in the provision virility enough to fully warrant its adoption. At the same time, if the attorney general of a State were to be engaged in some utterly bad piece of work, the Attorney General of the United States would restrain him.

Now, answering the question of the Senator from Michigan, I think the great trouble with the enforcement of the antitrust act lies in the fact that the various Attorneys General of the United States—I think there is no exception to the rule—have so hesitated about initiating litigation that the enforcement of the antitrust act has been to a large extent, until very recent years, practically nullified. They have seemed to be of the opinion that no case should ever be brought until they had made a preparation so complete, so perfect, and so absolute that they thought there was no conceivable or possible escape, with the result springing from that policy that they have brought but very few cases. We are told to-day that there are over a thousand combinations in restraint of trade; I have no doubt that is an understatement rather than an overstatement; and yet there are now pending a total of 46 cases in all the United States—46 cases, old and new, in the Supreme Court and in the nisi prius courts in the entire country.

Answering again the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan, as to what good would come from it and how it would stimulate, recognizing that the Attorneys General have always pursued the policy I have just indicated, I think an Attorney General might very well be heard to say: "I do not feel like bringing this suit; but if you desire to take the responsibility, and your State desires to pay the costs and test this thing out, I have no objection."

That, to my mind, presents a very practical question, and one which I think, in its practical application, will result in much good.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does the Senator feel that the attorney general of a State would have the power to expend the State's money in litigation which was begun under a Federal law without some additional State legislation to that effect?

Mr. REED. That will depend absolutely upon the laws of each State and upon the authority which has been conferred upon the attorneys general under the laws of the respective States. If we pass this bill, and there is any lack of authority, it can be speedily supplied by those States desiring to avail themselves of this privilege; but I think there are undoubtedly States where the attorney general has broad power, and where he can bring any suit in any way he pleases, so long as he is, in fact, bringing it for the benefit of the citizens of the State.

The Senator from Colorado desired to ask me a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, when I rose the Senator was being appealed to by various Senators to modify and change his amendment. I was going to appeal to him not to change the amendment as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, because I believe there should be a power in the United States Government to control this litigation, even if it is commenced by the attorney general of a State. I feel that without that power being vested in the Attorney General of the United States considerable harm and wrong might be done, whereas I believe it has some virility in it by reason of the fact that if the attorney general of a State shall present to the Attorney General of the United States a request to commence a suit, and he fails to do it, and then the attorney general of the State begins the suit, it would be a bold Attorney General of the United States who would attempt to come in and say, "I will not let that suit be prosecuted."

For those reasons it seems to me that the amendment of the Senator, as it is now, is far preferable to the suggestion that was made to eliminate part of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on yesterday, with a good deal of trepidation and my usual modesty, I propounded a couple of questions to the distinguished lawyers who are advocating this change. The responses that were made were not at all satisfactory to my mind. At least they did not lead me to believe that this is wise legislation, and I do not believe it now.

I am unable to work out in my mind the necessity that exists for this innovation. We have a Department of Justice of the United States, and that department has never asked for an appropriation since I have been in public life that it has not received. We have been not only generous but almost profligate in our appropriations to the Department of Justice. We are supposed to have a man at the head of that department who will do his duty. We have just confirmed a new man for that position, vouched for by eminent lawyers as a man of ability, integrity, and devotion to public duty. In that department we have a Solicitor General, an Assistant to the Attorney General, 6 Assistant Attorneys General, 3 special Assistant Attorneys General, 23 attorneys, 13 assistant attorneys, 12 special assistant attorneys, and 48 United States district attorneys distributed among the several States.

Mr. CHILTON. More than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, as has been suggested to me sotto voce by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in the last appropriation bill there were appropriations made for additional help in that department; and I apprehend that the great lump sum we give that department enables the Attorney General to employ further help if it is needed.

Mr. President, we have likewise created a Federal Trade Commission, which will be an expensive luxury before we get through with it, that takes jurisdiction over some of these cases at least, or some phases of this antitrust legislation; and I suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission deals with a certain class of cases that might well come under this head.

Why should we go into the States, ignoring the United States district attorneys, who are there to do this work under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, and take the attorneys general of the several States and impose this duty upon them? I do not know how it may be in other States, but I know that in the little State which I in part represent our attorney general is a very hard-worked man, and we have by statute prohibited him from doing any outside work, compelling him to give his entire time to the interests of the State, which he is doing with a good deal of ability. Why that man should now be required, at the expense of the State—which, to my mind, can not be done unless we have additional legislation giving him that authority—to engage in the prosecution of cases that belong to the Department of Justice of the United States, Federal in their nature, surpasses my comprehension.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the Senator if the adoption of this amendment would not be a confession that the people of the United States were incapable of directing and accomplishing the purposes for which the Federal Union was formed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, absolutely so, from my viewpoint. I am speaking now, as I said yesterday, as a layman. From my viewpoint it is an absolute confession of our inability through the Department of Justice to prosecute the suits that belong to that department.

Mr. WHITE. A further question: If this amendment is correct in principle, should we not also enact a law saying that whenever the governor of any State differs with the President of the United States about the enforcement of Federal laws or handling Federal questions, the matter should be left to the governor of the State?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am inclined to think that would be equally logical. It strikes me so.

As I said in the beginning, however, I speak with trepidation on this question. I have simply been trying to interpret it as best I could, and it does not appeal to me as wise legislation. It looks to me as though it is going to create a great deal of confusion. As it was in the original amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri, I saw this possible confusion: That the attorney general of the State of New Hampshire would proceed to prosecute a case under the antitrust laws; the attorney general of Missouri would start a prosecution of the same nature touching the same offense; the State of New Hampshire might lose the case and the State of Missouri might win the case, and there would be two differing results in prosecuting the same case; and so it would go throughout the Union. I presume the amendment that has been offered and accepted modifies that to a very considerable extent; but still I confess that, after giving this matter as careful thought as I am capable of giving it, I look upon it as unusual, unnecessary, and dangerous legislation, and for that reason my one vote will be cast against it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I do not share with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the apprehension that there is going to be too much enforcement of the antitrust law. You can not have too many men on guard. The public is not going to suffer by giving the attorneys general of the States the right to institute proceedings of this character when the Attorney General of the United States refuses, either himself or by direction of his assistants, to bring suit; nor will the attorney general of the State bring a suit that is going to involve costs to his constituents unless there is some good reason for it. He knows the operation and the effect of the trust, the predatory ravages of the combination in restraint of trade. He knows the effect upon his own constituents. He ascertains those facts by complaints from them. He is probably in a better position to know and find out the truth regarding these matters than the Attorney General sitting in Washington. When he devotes his talents and gives the information which he has gathered to the Department of Justice, cooperating with the Department of Justice in the enforcement of the laws designed to protect the people against predatory interests, I can not for the life of me see how any harm is going to result from it.

I think it was prudent in the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to accept the amendment offered giving the Attorney General of the United States final control of the litigation; and it would be better, I think, if he would amend it further so as to permit the Attorney General of the United States to dismiss the case with the approval of the court.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CHILTON. If it be true that it is best to have a great number on guard, why not go further in your legislation and give the prosecuting attorneys in the various counties in the various States the right to institute suit if the attorney general of the State does not act?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course you could carry it on down to the justice of the peace and the constable and any one individual, but that would carry it to an absurdity; whereas the proposition made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] simply gives to the Department of Justice the assistance of a man who is elected to office because of his fitness for the place, and who is in possession of information that ought to be of use to the Attorney General of the United States in the enforcement of the law. I can not see the harm that could result from it to the people. I am sure, however, the trusts that are liable to be prosecuted by the attorney general of the State think the power should not be given that State officer.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator allow me, then, to ask him another question?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will.

Mr. CHILTON. Has the Senator looked at the statutes of the United States as to the enforcement of this amendment? Does not the Senator know that in the United States courts there are two kinds of suits—civil and criminal? The only criminal suit known in the United States court, of course, is a prosecution by the district attorney. Has the Senator figured out that you can have the State pay the costs and that the attorney general of the State can have the use of the Federal officials or others in enforcing this law? Does not the Senator see that you have a conflict of jurisdiction?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I see no reason in the world why there should be a conflict any more than there would be if the Senator from West Virginia should go into court and proffer assistance to the Attorney General or the district attorney, and assist in the prosecution, and assist in gathering testimony for the prosecution of a suit. I do not see how any harm at all could come of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the Senator that I can see no reason why a State that has made a demand upon the Attorney General of the United States to bring suit, and he has declined to do so, should not have the right to bring suit, because its people are affected by the trust.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is exactly what I said a moment ago.

Mr. President I repeat that there is every reason why the attorney general of the State should be given this power to cooperate with the Department of Justice, and I have not heard one single logical objection to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that the people who are interested in the prosecution of such a suit are the people in the State, and not the people down here in Washington, or the Attorney General. They have not the interest which the people of a State have. It may be that the monopoly exists in that State, and that State alone. It is not impressed upon the Attorney General of the United States, but it is impressed upon the attorney general of the State, and it is impressed upon the people of the State. The only reason why the first amendment as proposed by the Senator was faulty, in my judgment, was because it could not or should not take it entirely out of the hands of the United States. There ought to be an influence there that will make him bring the suit, and if he declines, then to have him willingly let the State attorney general bring it.

I want to suggest, while I am on my feet, that I think there ought to be one word added to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It says "cost." There ought to be in the amendment the words "cost and expense." I do not know what the amount of the expense may be, but it ought to be on the people who are ready to institute this suit either against the advice or because of the negligence of the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with what the Senator has said about the attorney general of the State having a special knowledge of the conditions, perhaps, in his State, and that therefore he ought to have a right, if the Attorney General of the United States declines to do so, to begin this suit; but, as I understand the Senator from Colorado, he believes that after the attorney general of the State has done that, has expended the money of the taxpayers of the State, we should still give to the Attorney General of the United States the right to come in and dismiss the suit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I think so; because I believe you will have to have these prosecutions at least under the supervision of one head. I do not believe any Attorney General of the United States would order the dismissal of a suit unless it conflicted with some general policy which he was willing to advocate and let the people understand and know about. If he is willing to take that burden, I think he ought to have the right to have prosecutions uniform throughout the United States. I believe, however, that this amendment as it is proposed will have a wholesome influence upon the Attorneys General of the United States, and that they will not dismiss these cases if there is ground for bringing an action against any trust in the respective States or in any part of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator one question. Does he know of one case anywhere in the United States where an official of any State has asked the Attorney General of the United States to bring suit and the Attorney General refused to do it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know; but I do know that there were no prosecutions for years and years under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And complaint was made generally.

Mr. SMOOT. But I wanted to know if any Attorney General of the United States had refused to bring proceedings against any corporation that had been charged by an official of a State with violating the antitrust law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that is true, there can be no harm in this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is true, there is no need of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If it is his policy to do it when anyone requests him, surely when the attorney general, representing, no doubt, the administration of the State, requests the prosecution, the Attorney General will give it more attention than he would if the request came from an individual.

Mr. REED. I wish to answer the question that was asked by the Senator from Utah. I know of such cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator give the information to the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Chair will be compelled to make a ruling. There is a unanimous-consent agreement here, and it is being violated all the while.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Chair——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not so far as the Senator from Utah is concerned has it been violated, but the Chair is constrained to make this statement as to the enforcement of the agreement. When a Senator yields, if he yields for more than a question, the Chair is going to hold that the Senator who interrupts the Senator on the floor has made his one speech on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a very good ruling.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Committee on the Judiciary as a committee has taken no action with reference to this amendment though one similar to it was formally considered in the committee. I am not therefore authorized to speak for the committee with reference to the proposed amendment, but personally I am opposed to it upon the broad ground that it is best that authority for the enforcement of a general law of the United States should be lodged in the Attorney General and the district attorneys of the several districts. This has been provided for by section 4 of the Sherman law of 1890, and is brought down in conformity with certain conditions in section 13 of the bill under consideration.

In 1903 the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by Mr. Justice Harlan, construed section 4 of the Sherman law both as to its meaning and as to its probable policy. I ask the Secretary to read from that opinion in the case of Minnesota v. The Northern Securities Co. (194 U. S., the marked places at pp. 70 and 71). It expresses my judgment not only with reference to the proper construction of the statute, but the policy upon which it was based and ought to rest.

The Secretary read as follows:

The injury on account of which the present suit was brought is at most only remote and indirect; such an injury as would come alike, although in different degrees, to every individual owner of property in a State by reason of the suppression, in violation of the act of Congress, of free competition between interstate carriers engaged in business in such State; not such a direct, actual injury as that provided for in the seventh section of the statute. If Minnesota may, by an original suit, in its name, invoke the jurisdiction of the circuit court, because alone of the alleged remote and indirect injury to its proprietary interests arising from the mere absence of free competition in trade and commerce as carried on by interstate carriers within its limits, then every State upon like grounds may maintain, in its name, in a circuit court of the United States, a suit against interstate carriers engaged in business within their respective limits. Further, under that view every individual owner of property in a State may, upon like general grounds, by an original suit, irrespective of any direct or special injury to him, invoke the original jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States to restrain and prevent violations of the antitrust act of Congress. We do not think that Congress contemplated any such methods for the enforcement of the antitrust act. We can not suppose it was intended that the enforcement of the act should depend in any degree upon original suits in equity instituted by the States or by individuals to prevent violations of its provisions. On the contrary, taking all the sections of that act together, we think that its intention was to limit direct proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations of the antitrust act as cause injury to the general public, or to all alike, merely from the suppression of competition in trade and commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, to those instituted in the name of the United States under the fourth section of the act by district attorneys of the United States, acting under the direction of the Attorney General, thus securing the enforcement of the act, so far as direct proceedings in equity are concerned, according to some uniform plan, operative throughout the entire country. Possibly the thought of Congress was that by such a limitation upon suits in equity of a general nature to restrain violations of the act, irrespective of any direct injury sustained by particular persons or corporations, interstate and international trade and commerce and those carrying on such trade and commerce, as well as the general business of the country, would not be needlessly disturbed by suits brought on all sides and in every direction, to accomplish improper or speculative purposes. At any rate, the interpretation we have given of the act is a more reasonable one. It is a safe and conservative interpretation in view as well of the broad and exclusive power of Congress over interstate and international commerce as of the fact that, so far as such commerce is concerned, Congress has prescribed a specific mode for preventing restraints upon it, namely, suits in equity under the direction of the Attorney General. Of the present suit the Attorney General has no control and is without any responsibility for the manner in which it is conducted, although in its essential features it is just such a suit as would be brought by his direction when proceeding under the fourth section of the antitrust act.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, the question here relates to the enforcement of a Federal statute, and it is proposed by this amendment to call in 48 attorneys general of the different States to help enforce a Federal statute. I believe that this is an innovation unheard of and unparalleled in the history of congressional legislation. We are appointing under this proposed amendment 48 State attorneys general, who are charged with the enforcement of State laws, to help the Department of Justice enforce Federal laws. If this Federal antitrust statute is not sufficiently enforced, the true remedy is to strengthen the Department of Justice by adding further assistants.

Mr. President, the question of the enforcement of the antitrust law involves in a larger sense a question of policy. The President of the United States, whether a Democrat or a Republican, may have certain views in respect to the enforcement of this law. It may be that the President would like to have the policy of his party carried out with respect to the enforcement of this law. How can that be done if you have 48 attorneys general in the different States charged with the enforcement of this law?

This amendment will prevent the carrying out of any uniform policy in the enforcement of the antitrust law, and it can not but lead to confusion; and, further, this amendment is an admission that the Department of Justice is a failure and that it requires the assistance of the law departments of 48 States to enforce Federal law.

Mr. President, the Department of Justice is only one department of the Government; and if it is necessary to call upon the States to help us conduct this department, why should we not also call upon the States to afford assistance to the Executive in the execution of the laws? Or, to take a more extreme case, why should we not call upon the States to assist Congress in the passage of proper laws?

This proposed amendment, to my mind, is absolutely wrong in principle. It is an innovation upon our system of government and its division into different departments, and we should not for one moment consider the passage of such an amendment unless for very grave reasons.

I am not prepared to say that the Department of Justice—and I have had some experience with the different Attorneys General, both Democratic and Republican—has so far failed in its duty, for I know what a tremendous task it is to enforce this law; nor am I prepared to cast such a reflection upon that department as is involved in the proposition that we must go to the different States and call in their attorneys general to help the Attorney General of the United States to perform his duty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted. I think we are attempting to raise up a number of ghosts that will never materialize. I believe we are assuming things that we have no right to assume, namely, that the Attorney General will be liable to be dishonest and will not wish to perform his duty. I do not think it is necessary for us to assume that there will be a conflict between the Attorney General of the United States and the attorney general of any State.

Now, let us see what the mode of operation would be. The attorney general of a State that is directly affected by the trust action will ask the Attorney General of the United States to bring an action. He will not ask the Attorney General of the United States to institute that action unless he has some evidence and reason that will justify him in making the request. On the other hand, the Attorney General of the United States will not peremptorily refuse to prosecute that action. He will call in the attorney general of the State if he feels there is not sufficient evidence to justify him and say to him frankly, "I do not think we are justified under the evidence or under the law. Confer with me and tell me what evidence you have to produce and what is the law upon the case." Those two, then, without much question, will get together upon a line of procedure. The evidence may be almost wholly within the State of the attorney general. It may be that he is able to secure what the Attorney General might not be brought in close enough proximity to to know anything about. The attorney general of the State must not only have the evidence, but he must also have the consent and authority of his State. If he has it not directly under the law of his State, he must obtain it through a resolution, and an appropriation would have to be made to cover his expenses. You can rest assured that the State is not going into a case of this kind and shoulder the responsibility unless it has what appears to be a substantially clear case.

Mr. President, in every one of these most important cases the United States through its Attorney General has paid out vast sums of money to employ counsel in other States. If we can be justified, as we have justified ourselves every year by our acts, in employing outside counsel, I certainly think we may be justified in accepting the attorney general of another State who has been elected or appointed for the particular purpose of protecting the citizens of that State.

So I think, Mr. President, there is no real substantial conflict to endanger the authority of the United States, and I also believe that it will be of wonderful assistance to the Government of the United States to allow the State to come in, if it desires to do so of its own volition, and assist in the prosecution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course the motive back of this amendment is the proper enforcement of the law. I am in entire sympathy with the motive that is behind it. I doubt the wisdom of the amendment for this reason: It has been urged that the attorneys general of the States being upon the scene of action perhaps have a more direct knowledge of the facts involved in the alleged violation of the law, but each State has United States district attorneys who are residents of the respective States. They are just as much interested in the enforcement of the law within the boundaries of that State as can be the Attorney General.

What I most fear is the effect of the divided responsibility when it comes to the enforcement of the law. If you are to have one head with his various assistants in the persons of the United States district attorneys, who are responsible to the Department of Justice, it seems to me that we are more likely to have a vigorous enforcement of the law than if we are to say to the State attorney general, "You may enforce this," or to the Department of Justice here at Washington, "You may enforce it."

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me? The law states that the Department of Justice shall enforce it.

Mr. POMERENE. That is all true.

Mr. REED. This is simply giving the privilege to the States.

Mr. POMERENE. That is all true; but it is also suggested by one of the amendments that the attorneys general of the States may have direct charge of such cases, independent of the Department of Justice here at Washington. That is a part of the vice of this proposition.

But let us go a little further in this matter. If it is a proper thing to have the States interfere or inject themselves into the enforcement of Federal law, it would likewise be a good thing to have the Federal Government inject itself into the enforcement of the State laws. What is going to be the effect of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would result in a divided jurisdiction.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly; the jurisdiction would be divided; the responsibility would be divided; and, as a result, in my judgment, the law would not be so well enforced as it now is.

More than that, I submit this proposition: That in all of the larger States the attorneys general of those States have quite enough to do to enforce the laws of their own States. If you are going to permit them to wander out into other fields, there will be a temptation on the part of some of the attorneys general of the States to ignore the matters at home, thinking that they can, perhaps, get more publicity—I am sorry to say it, but that is the fact with respect of some of them—by taking up the larger matters that concern the enforcement of the Federal statutes.

So, in my judgment, if proper assistance is not furnished the Federal Department of Justice to enforce the antitrust laws, we should provide for more United States district attorneys. Let us provide for more assistants, who will be specially charged with this duty; but let us not tempt the attorneys general of the several States to desert their own duties for another field that, for one reason or another, they might find to be more attractive.

I believe that, on the whole, instead of this proposition aiding in the enforcement of the law we should simply have a state of confusion worse confounded. I believe, for these reasons, the amendment is not a wise one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. Mr. REED offers, as modified, the following amendment as a new section:

SEC. —. That the attorney general of any State may, at the cost of the State, bring suit in the name of the United States in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties to enforce any of the antitrust laws: Provided, That at least 90 days before commencing suit the attorney general of the State has requested the Attorney General of the United States to bring such suit, and such request has not been complied with by the Attorney General of the United States; and said Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to appear and participate in said suit with said attorney general of the State, and the Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to control the prosecution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment by inserting the words "and expense" after the word "cost," so as to read "the cost and expense."

Mr. REED. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the word "district" should be inserted before the word "court," so that it would read "district court of the United States."

Mr. REED. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. In the opinion of the Chair, have I the right to speak further upon this amendment? I thought I had. I have been answering questions, and I carefully reserved about 10 minutes of my time; but if every interrogatory I have answered is to be charged to me as a speech, I have exhausted my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has offered an amendment to the amendment. The whole question is again open for discussion.

Mr. REED. That is as I understand it. Mr. President, I will take only a few minutes, just long enough to answer the points that have been raised.

There is nothing in the point raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that this will invite attorneys general of States into new fields, and lead them to go out and endeavor to exploit themselves. The attorneys general of States may fairly be presumed to be men of a reasonable degree of common sense. What they are interested in is the protection of the people of their respective States. Of course it is not intended that they shall wander beyond the State borders; but it is intended to give them the right to invoke the tremendous powers now granted by this amended bill, namely, to use the decrees of other courts in other cases in evidence, to have the right to summon witnesses, and to do those various other things for which we have provided in the pending bill.

Mr. President, another word. I utterly repudiate the idea that the attorneys general of the States will engage in a senseless and useless proceeding. It is absurd to the last degree to claim that an attorney general of a State would enter upon the enforcement of this proposed law except for the protection of his own people when his State is required to bear the cost and expense. Neither is there, in my judgment, the slightest ground to claim that attorneys general of the States will interfere with the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of the United States, save and except where the people of some State are being burdened and oppressed and the Attorney General of the United States, either for lack of time or for some other reason, may be unwilling to invoke this law.

Why, Mr. President, it is all right to assume in an argument, if you wish to do so, that the Attorney General of the United States is always capable, is always honest, is always wise, is always infallible, and, in contrast with that, to assume that the attorneys general of the States are all foolish, are all incompetent, and are all untrustworthy; but, on the contrary, I think we ought to assume, generally, that all these men are human beings, and that all of them have some good and some bad in them.

I call attention, however, in passing, to the fact that the best enforcement there has been of antitrust legislation, the best protection the people have ever obtained, and without which there would have been no real enforcement of any antitrust legislation, is found in the action of the attorneys general of the respective States. In Texas they have lashed corporation after corporation engaged in restraining trade from the borders of that great State; they have done the same thing in my State; they have done it in the State of Kansas. Every attorney general of a State, however, bringing a case under a State statute has found himself confronted with the fact that his powers were not nearly so broad and his ability to mass evidence not nearly so complete as it would be if he could avail himself of the provisions of this bill. What harm can come in allowing the attorney general of a State to initiate litigation at the cost of his State when the Attorney General of the United States in every instance can stop it if he sees fit to stop it?

Mr. President, it has been urged with great vehemence that we should trust entirely to the Attorneys General of the United States, and eulogies have been pronounced upon them. I say that the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act has been a farce, a sham, and a disgrace to our jurisprudence. It was enacted over 20 years ago; since that time hundreds, if not thousands, of combinations in restraint of trade have been formed; and in all that time there has not yet been one man put behind the bars of a jail or of a penitentiary for violating the provisions of that law. In that, sir, I shall speak now by authority and not as one of the scribes.

I hold in my hand a letter, which I will not take the time to read, but will send to the desk to be printed in the RECORD, coming from the private secretary of the present Attorney General, inclosing a document, which I also ask to have printed in the RECORD, giving a history of antitrust litigation now pending. That document states that there are now pending 46 cases, whereas we are told there are over a thousand trusts and monopolies in the United States. Forty-six cases in all the courts—in the appellate courts as well as in the nisi prius courts, in the courts of appeal as well as in the Supreme Court of the United States—only 46 cases. There ought to be 400 cases. I read:

The fundamental weakness in the enforcement of the antitrust act in previous administrations was the failure to insist upon a real dissolution of monopolies and combinations which the courts had adjudged unlawful.

If that is the record—and this is the assertion of the private secretary of the man whom we have just placed upon the Supreme Court of the United States—if that, sir, is the record that has been made for 20 long years in the Department of Justice, it is high time that men elected by the people of the respective States should be given authority to invoke this great law and to put some blood and iron into its enforcement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I do, if it is not counted in my time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I merely desire to ask a question. Does the Senator think that it is becoming in a private secretary to make an observation of that kind in a letter?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know whether it is becoming or unbecoming; but the letter states—and it is on the letterhead of the Attorney General:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 29, 1914.

HON. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of inclosing herein a carbon copy of a sketch of the work of the Department of Justice under Attorney General McReynolds, which was recently prepared. It shows succinctly what has been going on at the department under the present administration in the way of trust prosecutions. There has been added a brief paragraph with regard to the white-slave traffic act. I send it to you for whatever use you may desire to make of it.

Very truly, yours,

J. T. SUTER, Private Secretary.

Inclosure.

The use I desire to make of it is the use I am now making of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator read the criticism which the private secretary made of the department?

Mr. REED. I have already read that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like the Senator to reread it.

Mr. REED. I shall put the entire document in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that I may do so at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ENFORCEMENT OF THE ANTITRUST ACT.

The preservation of fair competition in trade and the prevention of monopoly are essential to the general welfare. Therefore efficient and energetic enforcement of the Federal antitrust act prohibiting restraints and monopolizations of interstate trade is of the highest importance to the people. The work of the present administration in that regard is set forth below.

There are now pending in the Federal courts 46 proceedings under the antitrust act. There are also pending numerous investigations of alleged violations of the act. These proceedings and investigations are being conducted by the Department of Justice, which is charged by law with the enforcement of the act.

WEAKNESS IN PAST ENFORCEMENT OF THE ACT.

The fundamental weakness in the enforcement of the antitrust act in previous administrations was the failure to insist upon a real dissolution of monopolies and combinations which the courts had adjudged unlawful.

In the principal case in the Roosevelt administration—the Northern Securities case—and in the principal cases in the Taft administration—the Standard Oil case, the Tobacco case, and the Powder case—the parts into which the unlawful monopoly was divided were left in control of the same persons. The only effect of this was to change the form of the monopoly, since, of course, competition in any real sense can not exist between corporations controlled by the same persons. The law was thus virtually nullified by reason of the defective manner of its enforcement.

On the other hand, the present administration has insisted in every case—notably the Union Pacific-Southern Pacific merger case, the Telephone case, the New Haven case, and the Harvester case—that the parts into which the unlawful combination or monopoly was or may be divided must be separate and distinct in ownership and must not be left under the control of the same set of men. In this way only can real competitive conditions be brought about.

UNION PACIFIC-SOUTHERN PACIFIC MERGER CASE.

This case was decided by the Supreme Court December 2, 1912. It was held (1) that the Union Pacific Co. are substantial competitors in interstate transportation, and (2) that the acquisition by the former of a controlling stock interest in the latter created a combination in restraint of trade (226 U. S., 61).

How to dissolve the combination was one of the first problems which the present administration had to meet. It was insisted for the Government that the dissolution should be effectual, and especially that it should be free from the fundamental defect in the plans adopted in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, where the separate parts into which the businesses were divided were left under the control of the same stockholders. Several proposals by the Union Pacific Co. were rejected because they did not adequately guard against a similar result. Through conferences between the Attorney General and counsel for the defendants a plan satisfactory to the Government was finally worked out and submitted to Circuit Judges Sanborn, Hook, and Smith at St. Paul on June 30, 1913, and by them embodied in a decree. Briefly stated, the plan was as follows:

1. Of the $126,650,000 of Southern Pacific stock held by it the Union Pacific Co. was authorized to sell $38,292,400 to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. in exchange for $42,547,200 of the capital stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. This aided in separating the Southern Pacific from the Union Pacific and at the same time divested the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. of a large amount of the capital stock of an active competitor—the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.—thereby dissolving, without the cost and delay of litigation, another unlawful combination. No new combination in restraint of trade was created by the exchange, since the Pennsylvania and the Southern Pacific systems are noncompetitive, and the same is true of the Union Pacific and the Baltimore & Ohio.

2. After this exchange there was left in the ownership of the Union Pacific $88,357,600 of Southern Pacific stock. This was transferred in trust to the Central Trust Co. of New York—an independent institution—which became a party to the suit and completely subject to the direction of the court. The trust company was authorized to issue certificates of interest representing this stock, and these were offered to Union Pacific stockholders. The holder of such a certificate, however, has no right to vote or receive dividends in respect of the stock, but he may convert it into Southern Pacific stock by making affidavit that he owns no Union Pacific stock and is not acting on behalf of any Union Pacific stockholder, or in concert, agreement, or understanding with anyone to obtain control of the Southern Pacific Co. in the interest of the Union Pacific Co., but in his own behalf and in good faith.

Pending such conversion the trust company was authorized to collect the dividends accruing on the stock and to vote the same only when and as directed by the court. Upon conversion of a certificate of interest into Southern Pacific stock the holder becomes entitled to receive the accumulated dividends. Of course the purpose in withholding the dividends is to accelerate the distribution of the Southern Pacific stock among persons not Union Pacific stockholders.

If by January 1, 1916, any certificates of interest have not been converted into Southern Pacific stock, the court may order the sale of the Southern Pacific stock represented by such certificates.

The plan effectually prevented the Union Pacific Co. or its stockholders who were parties to the combination from continuing in control of the Southern Pacific. The great advantage of the course pursued over a compulsory and immediate sale of the $126,650,000 of Southern Pacific stock is that, whilst as effectually dissolving the combination, it saved the stockholders of both companies from unnecessary losses and avoided the very serious financial strain which such a sale would have entailed.

In actual practice the plan has worked successfully. Up to July 1, 1914, through conversion of the certificates of interest or of subscription receipts issued by the trust company, $81,606,000 of the $88,357,600 of Southern Pacific stock transferred to the trust company by the Union Pacific Co. has passed into the hands of persons who made the required affidavits.

Summed up, the plan adopted in this case not only effectually dissolved the particular unlawful combination therein complained of, but also dissolved without further litigation the unlawful combination resulting from the ownership by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. of over $42,000,000 of the capital stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

The principle established by this decree, namely, that in the dissolution of combinations in restraint of trade the separate parts must not be left in control of the same stockholders, has since been strictly adhered to.

TELEPHONE CASES.

For a long time there had been persistent complaints made to the department by the so-called independent telephone companies that the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and its associated companies, commonly known as the Bell system, were attempting to bring under one control the means of communication by wire throughout the entire country, not only through the expansion and extension of their own system, but by the acquisition of competing lines, in violation of the Federal antitrust laws. The American Co., indeed, had frankly admitted its purpose in this regard in its annual report for the year ending December 31, 1910, in which it is stated:

"This process of combination will continue until all telephone exchanges and lines will be merged either into one company owning and operating the whole system or until a number of companies with territories determined by political, business, or geographical conditions, each performing all functions pertaining to local management and operation, will be closely associated under the control of one central organization exercising all the functions of centralized general administration."

The department investigated these complaints and found that they were not without basis. The Bell system had already so far accomplished its purpose that considerably more than half of all the telephones in the United States were under its control, and it also had acquired through stock ownership practical control of the largest of the two principal telegraph companies of the country.

In July, 1913, a suit was instituted under the antitrust act at Portland, Oreg., against companies comprising the Bell system and others, charging them with having entered into a combination to monopolize the means of telephonic communication in and between the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho.

Some time after the institution of this suit the officers and directors of the Bell system indicated that they were desirous of bringing its organization and business throughout the country generally into harmony with the antitrust laws as construed by the Department of Justice, and to that end conferences were had between officers of the department and officers of the Bell system.

In compliance with the suggestions of the Attorney General, formulated in the course of these conferences, the Bell system committed itself to the following course of action, briefly stated:

First. It agreed to dispose of its entire holdings of stock of the Western Union Telegraph Co. in such way that the control and management of the latter will be entirely independent.

Second. It agreed not to make any further acquisitions, directly or indirectly, of competing telephone systems.

Third. It agreed to connect its long-distance wires with the exchanges of independent companies.

Of course, the interpretation of the antitrust act on which was based the action taken by the department in respect of the Bell system does not mean that where there are two telephone systems in a city or town there never can be a consolidation into a single system. It does mean that where competition has been established in long-distance telephony between points in different States it can not be destroyed by contract or consolidation. This interpretation leaves local communities generally free to have one telephone system, if they desire, subject to the condition that in the event of a consolidation the consolidated company will make connections with all long-distance interstate lines and thereby preserve competition in interstate communication.

It should also be kept in mind that the requirement that the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. relinquish its control of the Western Union Telegraph Co. does not mean that they can not continue to cooperate where their services are supplementary rather than competitive. In other words, the action of the department, while requiring these two companies to be under separate control and management, so that in so far as they perform like services the public may have the benefit of competition between them, also leaves them entirely free to cooperate for the benefit of the public in so far as their services are supplementary.

There was left to be disposed of the before-mentioned suit instituted at Portland, Oreg., against the companies comprising the Bell system for attempting to monopolize the means of telephonic communication in and between the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho.

After extended negotiations, the defendants consented to the entry of a decree in favor of the Government.

The attempt of the Bell system to monopolize all of the means of communication by wire has thus been effectually prevented.

NEW HAVEN CASE.

In May, 1908, Attorney General Bonaparte instituted a suit under the antitrust act attacking, in part, the monopoly of transportation facilities in New England held by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. Whilst that suit was seriously inadequate, in that it did not attack the New Haven's control of water transportation to and from New England, the defect could have been remedied by amending the bill of complaint. Instead of doing that, the Taft administration discontinued the suit altogether, and thereafter the New Haven Co. still further strengthened its hold upon the transportation facilities of New England.

Regarding the creation of this monopoly as a defiant violation of the antitrust act, Attorney General McReynolds began preparations to attack it immediately upon taking office. By that time, however, the New Haven Co. and the Boston & Maine Railroad, which it controls, had been reduced to the unfortunate state now known to all the country. In consequence, their securities, which were widely distributed amongst small investors, had shrunk in value enormously, and the commerce and industries of all New England were seriously affected and under severe strain.

In this condition of affairs, Attorney General McReynolds, whilst intent upon enforcing the law, was obviously under the duty to move toward that end along the course which promised the least possible further distress to the stricken investors and unsettled industries of New England. In accordance with that policy he granted the request of the new management of the New Haven Co. to enter into negotiations with a view to bringing about, without a protracted and necessarily unsettling contest, a dissolution of the unlawful monopoly, and in the meantime sought to avoid any action that might hinder in any way the accomplishment of that end so important to the people of New England. During the negotiations the criminal aspects of the case were kept constantly in mind and care was taken to do nothing which might interfere with proper prosecutions at the appropriate time.

As a result of the negotiations a plan of voluntary dissolution was agreed upon by which—

1. The agreement between the New Haven Co. and the New York Central for the joint operation of the Boston & Albany Railroad will be canceled.
2. The New Haven Co. will relinquish control of the Boston & Maine Railroad.
3. The New Haven Co. will dispose of its interests in trolley lines.
4. The New Haven Co. will dispose of its interests in ocean steamship lines between the ports of New England and New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other Atlantic seaports.
5. Whether the New Haven Co. shall be permitted to retain control of its steamboat lines on Long Island Sound will be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for determination pursuant to the provisions of the Panama Canal act.

The criminal aspects of the case will shortly be presented to the grand jury, but it must be borne in mind that the Federal Government can institute prosecutions in this case only in respect of transactions involving restraints of trade or attempts to monopolize. It has no power to institute prosecutions for the punishment of those responsible for the financial irregularities brought to light in the New Haven Co., since there is no existing law under which the Federal Government can prosecute the officers, directors, or other agents of a railroad company created by a State for improvident or dishonest management of the financial affairs of the company.

THE HARVESTER CASE.

The suit to dissolve the International Harvester Co. as a combination in restraint of trade and a monopoly has been prosecuted to a conclusion in the district court, which, on August 12, 1914, sustained the contention of the Government and ordered the combination dissolved. The court, adopting the principle steadfastly insisted upon by this administration, provided in its decree that the parts into which the combination was ordered to be dissolved should be separately owned and should not be left under the control of a single set of stockholders. On account of the importance of the issues involved in this case, Attorney General McReynolds himself went to St. Paul to take part, on behalf of the Government, in the final argument.

THE ANTHRACITE COAL CASES.

On September 2, 1913, suit was commenced under the antitrust act at Philadelphia against the Reading Co., its officers and directors and affiliated corporations. This combination is the backbone of the anthracite coal monopoly. It controls, according to its own estimate, 63 per cent of the entire deposits, and its supply will outlast by many years that of any other producer. In time, therefore, this combination, if not dissolved, will own or control every ton of commercially available anthracite coal known to exist. The case has proceeded expeditiously. The evidence has been taken, the arguments have been heard, and a decision by the United States district court at Philadelphia is awaited.

On March 18, 1914, suit was commenced under the antitrust act against the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., its officers and directors and affiliated corporations, charging them with having monopolized the production, transportation, and sale of anthracite coal from mines located along the lines of the Lehigh Valley Railroad. Next to the Reading Co. the Lehigh Valley Co. is the most important factor in the anthracite trade. All the evidence has been taken and the case will be argued in the coming fall.

The Reading Co. and the Lehigh Valley Co. are also charged in these suits with transporting anthracite coal in which they have an interest in violation of the commodity clause, which prohibits railroads from transporting in interstate-commerce articles in which they have any interest direct or indirect.

The purpose of the commodity clause is to protect shippers from the unlawful discriminations and disadvantages inherent in the ownership by railroads of the property transported by them, and to prevent railroads from monopolizing by means of such discriminations the production and sale of articles transported over their lines.

On July 13, 1914, the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. was indicted in the western district of New York for violating the commodity clause in transporting anthracite coal nominally owned by the Susquehanna Coal Co. but in fact owned, as the Government contends, by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

There is also pending on appeal to the Supreme Court a case instituted in February, 1913, against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. for alleged violations of the commodity clause. This case was decided against the Government in the lower court.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC-CENTRAL PACIFIC MERGER CASE.

In the course of the proceedings to dissolve the combination between the Union Pacific Railroad Co. and the Southern Pacific Co. the question of the legality of the control of the Central Pacific Railway Co. by the Southern Pacific Co. arose, the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific being competitors in the same way as the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific. The Attorney General endeavored to have the relations between the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific brought into harmony with law by the final decree in the Union Pacific-Southern Pacific case and thereby obviate further litigation. This effort was thwarted by the objections of the defendants, and on February 11, 1914, suit was instituted to compel the Southern Pacific to relinquish its control of the Central Pacific. The case is now pending.

METROPOLITAN TOBACCO CASE.

By dealing with it exclusively and upon preferential terms, the old Tobacco Trust enabled the Metropolitan Tobacco Co. to acquire complete control of the jobbing trade in tobacco products in the area between Trenton, N. J., on the south, and Stamford, Conn., on the north, embracing the entire metropolitan district. The purpose of the trust was to enable the Metropolitan Co. to drive all other jobbers out of business and thereby close the avenues of distribution against independent manufacturers of tobacco products.

After the business of the trust was dissolved, as a result of the suit instituted by the Government, into substantially four parts, controlled by the American Tobacco Co., the Lorillard Co., the Liggett & Myers Co., and the R. J. Reynolds Co., respectively, these companies continued to sell their products in the metropolitan district exclusively to the Metropolitan Tobacco Co., thereby perpetuating its control of the jobbing trade in that territory.

Complaints were made to the department in respect of this condition, and the companies were notified that the department regarded the condition as a violation of the antitrust laws. As yet no final action has been taken by the department. However, the action thus far taken has resulted in each of the four manufacturing companies agreeing to sell their products to all jobbers in the metropolitan district upon the same terms that they sell to the Metropolitan Co.

THREAD CASE.

On June 2, 1914, a decree was entered in the United States District Court of New Jersey dissolving a combination between J. & P. Coats (Ltd.), and affiliated corporations, and the American Thread Co. and affiliated corporations (the most important factors in the thread trade) and enjoining them from employing against independent manufacturers of thread certain unfair trade practices. There is every reason to believe that the result will be not only to restore competition between J. & P. Coats (Ltd.) and the American Thread Co., but also to permit independent manufacturers to compete freely.

AMERICAN CAN CO. CASE.

On November 19, 1913, suit was instituted in the United States district court at Baltimore against the American Can Co., a corporation capitalized at over $80,000,000, charging it with having monopolized the manufacture and sale of tin cans used largely for packing food products. The taking of testimony is in progress.

THE BUTTER AND EGG CASES.

On April 27, 1914, a decree was entered in the United States district court at Chicago enjoining the Elgin Board of Trade from continuing certain practices by which the prices of butter throughout a large area were arbitrarily fixed.

Within the last few weeks a similar proceeding against the Chicago Butter & Egg Board was decided in favor of the Government. In this case the prices of both butter and eggs were involved.

OATMEAL CASE.

On June 11, 1913, suit was instituted at Chicago, in the northern district of Illinois, against the Quaker Oats Co. and others, charging a combination to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce in oatmeal products and by-products. The taking of testimony on behalf of the Government has been concluded.

TOASTED CORN FLAKES CASE.

On December 26, 1912, suit was instituted against the Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. and others, charging that the defendants were restraining and attempting to monopolize interstate commerce in Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes by fixing and enforcing resale prices for that product. The case has been argued before the district court, and a decision is awaited.

BICYCLE PARTS CASE.

On May 27, 1913, suit was instituted in the United States District Court for the Western District of New York against the New Departure Manufacturing Co. and others, charging them with having formed a combination to restrain and monopolize the manufacture and sale of bicycle and motor-cycle parts and coaster brakes. The defendants did not contest the case, and a decree was entered in accordance with the prayer of the petition. The defendants also pleaded guilty to indictments for the same offense and were fined $81,500.

CLOTHES WRINGER CASE.

On May 22, 1914, the American Wringer Co. and the Lovell Manufacturing Co., which are the principal manufacturers of clothes wringers, were indicted at Pittsburgh, in the western district of Pennsylvania, for entering into a combination to fix prices.

PLUMBING SUPPLIES CASE.

On June 4, 1914, an indictment was obtained in the southern district of Idaho against a combination charged with restraining trade in plumbing supplies. The case has been set for trial on December 8, 1914.

KODAK CASE.

On June 9, 1913, suit was instituted in the western district of New York against the Eastman Kodak Co., which is charged with having acquired a monopoly of the business of manufacturing, selling, and distributing photographic supplies. The trial of this case is now proceeding.

FISH CASE.

On July 20, 1914, an indictment was obtained in the western district of Washington against the Booth Fisheries Co. and others, charging them with maintaining a combination to fix the prices of fish in certain parts of the country.

JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.

On November 18, 1913, a suit was instituted in the United States district court at New York City against the National Wholesale Jewelers' Association and others, charging them with conspiring to prevent manufacturers of jewelry from selling jewelry direct to retail dealers. On January 30, 1914, a decree was entered enjoining the defendants from further carrying out the conspiracy.

SOUTHERN WHOLESALE GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

On July 29, 1913, fines aggregating $5,500 were imposed upon this association and several of its members for violating the decree entered October 17, 1911, enjoining the association and its members from interfering with the free flow of trade in groceries.

ALASKA TRANSPORTATION CASES.

There were two indictments—one charging a conspiracy to monopolize the wharf facilities at Skagway, the other a conspiracy to monopolize steamship transportation between Puget Sound and certain Alaskan ports. In February, 1914, fines aggregating $28,000 were imposed.

THE BITUMINOUS COAL CASE.

The petition in this case, which was filed in August, 1911, charged a combination to monopolize the production and transportation of bituminous coal in and from the Ohio fields and, to a certain extent, the West Virginia fields. On March 14, 1914, a decree was entered adjudging the combination unlawful and dissolving it generally in accord with the contentions of the Government.

THE STEEL CASE.

This is a suit to dissolve the United States Steel Corporation on the ground that it is a combination in restraint of trade. The prosecution of the suit has been conducted vigorously. The testimony has all been taken and the final argument has been set for October 20, 1914.

THE SUGAR CASE.

The suit instituted several years ago against the American Sugar Refining Co., charging it with being a combination in restraint of trade, is being vigorously prosecuted, and will shortly be ready for final hearing.

THE LUMBER CASE.

The suit against the associations of retail lumber dealers in the eastern part of the United States, charging them with having entered into a combination to prevent lumber manufacturers and wholesale dealers from selling directly to consumers, was argued before the Supreme Court at the October term, 1913, and was decided in favor of the Government.

SHOE MACHINERY CASE.

The trial of the suit against the United Shoe Machinery Co. and others, charged with restraining and monopolizing interstate and foreign trade in shoe machinery, was completed in June, 1914, and the decision of the trial court is awaited.

KEYSTONE WATCH CASE.

The trial of the case against the Keystone Watch Case Co. and others for restraining and monopolizing trade in filled watch cases and watches was completed in June, 1914, and the decision of the trial court is awaited.

STEAMSHIP POOL CASES.

In 1912 suits were instituted against the Prince Line (Ltd.) and others, charging a combination to restrain and monopolize ocean transportation between ports of the United States and ports of Brazil by means of pooling agreements, rebates, etc.; and against the American-Asiatic Steamship Co. and others, charging a combination to restrain and monopolize by like means ocean transportation between ports on the Atlantic coast of the United States and ports in the Philippine Islands, Japan, China, and the Far East.

The taking of testimony in these cases has been completed, and the final hearings in the lower court will take place in the fall.

MOTION PICTURE CASE.

The trial of the case against the Motion Picture Patents Co. and others, charged with imposing restraints on interstate and foreign trade in machines, appliances, etc., relating to the motion-picture art, has been completed in the lower court except for the final argument, which has been set for September 14, 1914.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD SECURITIES ISSUES.

The country is familiar with the wrecking, financially speaking, of such great railroad systems as the New York, New Haven & Hartford, the Rock Island, the Frisco, the Pittsburgh Wabash Terminal, and the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton.

In consequence innocent investors have suffered disastrously and the prosperity of the country as a whole has been injured.

This condition of affairs was made possible because the officers and directors of interstate railroad corporations were not subject to adequate public control in the issuance of securities.

Not only did these abuses grow up while the Republican Party was in power, but that party took no step to remove the cause, namely, complete absence of any control by the Federal Government over the issuance of securities by interstate railroads. It remained for a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President to provide the remedy by the passage of an act giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to regulate and control the issuance of stocks and bonds of interstate railroads. The act also makes it unlawful for any officer or director of any carrier to receive for his own benefit, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value in respect of the negotiation, hypothecation, or sale by the carrier of any securities issued by the carrier, or to participate in the making or paying of any dividends of an operating carrier except from its profits or surplus. Any person violating this section of the law will be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both.

The cause of financial corruption in this important quarter being known, a law to insure healthy conditions in the future has been enacted.

Inflation and deception may seem to prosper for awhile, but they will not endure. They are inevitably followed by suffering, and eventually ruin. Their evil consequences are dependent upon their extent and their duration. To prevent them in the first place is to establish business as it should be established—so firmly and so permanently that it will withstand the severest tests.

WHITE-SLAVE TRAFFIC ACT.

The white-slave traffic act was placed upon the statute books June 25, 1910. Up to and including February 28, 1913, there had been 827 indictments, 468 convictions, 70 nol prossed, and 73 acquittals, a total of 620 cases disposed of, leaving pending at the beginning of this administration 177 cases.

From March 1, 1913, to July 31, 1914, there have been 571 indictments, 421 convictions, 54 nol prossed, and 60 acquittals, a total of 535 cases disposed of, leaving pending August 1, 1914, 213 cases.

It will be seen that the law was in effect 32 months, or 2 years and 8 months, before the beginning of the present administration, during which time 620 white-slave cases were finally disposed of, there being in that period 468 convictions.

Under the present administration, in 17 months, or 1 year and 5 months, 535 cases were disposed of, in which convictions were obtained in 421 cases.

In other words, after the enactment of the white-slave traffic law the Republicans were in charge of the administration for a period of one year and three months longer than has been the life of the present administration, but during that time the previous administration obtained only 47 more convictions than have been obtained under the present administration up to July 31, 1914.

It is a matter of court record that under the present administration there has been a constant increase in the effectiveness of the enforcement of the white-slave traffic law, and the records show that during the last few months of the last term of the Federal courts the number of indictments steadily increased until in each succeeding month all previous records were broken.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, here is the trouble with the enforcement of this act. I am not prepared to charge bad faith to past Attorneys General of the United States, but I am prepared to say that, in my humble judgment, the same zeal has not been back of the enforcement of this law many times that has been back of the enforcement of the laws aimed at the poor fellow who makes moonshine whisky or sells a box of cigars without having the correct number of stamps upon the box. As to any law that has been so enforced that monopoly has grown like a green bay tree, so that its evil roots have spread into every State and every community, I am prepared to say that you need some more enforcement and you need some independent action by independent men.

I have heard attorneys general of States sneered at here; but I say to you that the Attorney General of the United States can not personally examine all these questions; hence he must turn many of them over to subordinates; and, taking the attorneys general of the various States of the Union and comparing them with the subordinates over here in this office, they stand in a great many instances as giants compared with pigmies. Moreover, they have a direct responsibility to the people of their respective States; they know when the iron is entering the souls of the business men of their States, and they rise to the occasion.

I have heard the question asked, Has a State official ever asked to have a prosecution begun which was not begun? I do not know with reference to the Northern Securities case, whether or not a request was made, but I do know that 10 long years ago the attorney general of the State of Minnesota sought to bring such litigation, and I do know that the Supreme Court did not say it was improper for him to bring it; they simply said the law had not yet conferred the authority. We are seeking to confer that authority. If it had existed at that time, the Northern Securities case would have been won and ended years before it was ended under the Government prosecution which was thereafter brought.

Mr. President, there can no harm result from the enactment of this legislation as it is drawn. I do not know why we should have such tenderness about creating new means for controlling these institutions. You say it is an innovation; all progress is innovation; all change is innovation. The question is not whether this is new, but whether it is wise. In view of the past history of this class of litigation, however, it is evident that we need something new, it is evident that we need innovation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, only a word in connection with the remarks just submitted by the Senator from Missouri. I do not know, of course, what is contained in the document which he has sent to the Secretary's desk to have printed in the RECORD; but with reference to the criticism which he has read from the private secretary to the Attorney General concerning the enforcement of the Sherman law, I think it might be well to place in the RECORD a few plain facts. I have here a list of the cases instituted by the United States under the antitrust law. This list is brought up to the date of just a few days ago—it was sent to me in answer to a letter of mine to the Attorney General—and it is supplemented with a typewritten list of cases that have been brought since the document was printed. It shows that during the four years of the preceding administration 89 cases were brought under the antitrust law. I have counted the cases which have been brought under all the administrations, and they amount to something over 160; so that during the last administration more cases were brought under the antitrust law than under all other administrations since that law was passed, and more than one-half of all the cases brought, including the present administration.

Under the present administration, which has been in office almost two years—its time is almost half gone—although there is a large number of apparently known combinations, as is evidenced by the list printed in the RECORD by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] a few days ago and a list printed by some other Senator showing the large number of combinations which seem to be well known to exist—this administration has brought only 17 cases, and the last one was brought July 23, 1914; so that this is very close up to date and shows no great or startling activity on the part of the present administration, notwithstanding its loud professions. It has not by any means thus far kept pace with the preceding administration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, taking this document which the Senator has presented, I think it will make the activities of the Department of Justice more to its credit than has been represented. The criticism that this secretary makes, I think, is in very bad taste; but the memorandum shows that under the present administration, in 17 months, or 1 year and 5 months—that is, under Mr. McReynolds's jurisdiction—535 cases were disposed of, in 421 of which convictions were obtained.

Mr. REED. What kind of cases?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know what kind.

Mr. REED. Not trust cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. They were apparently antitrust cases, I should judge.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; white-slave cases and every other kind of case that was tried.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what this man is discussing. I do not know the nature of the cases.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that included cases of selling liquor to Indians and all such cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not say so.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator to let me see that document.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. However, I have no disposition to discuss this matter a moment further. I have an impression that a good deal more work is being done than has been represented in certain quarters. I repeat that the criticism of the late administration of the Department of Justice by a clerk is so clearly in bad taste and absurd that it ought to be rebuked by this body; and, personally, I want to enter my dissent to it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. This criticism purports to come from a private secretary of an Attorney General who has just been confirmed as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. And it is a criticism of the previous administration in the enforcement of the antitrust law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from New Hampshire is no doubt familiar with the fact that during practically all of that administration the present Attorney General, who has just been confirmed, was a member of the force for the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. So that this presumptuous criticism from a private secretary is really a criticism of the man for whom he is acting as secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. And I presume later on he will take the same liberty to criticize the man whom we have made Attorney General by our recent action.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think, in fairness, the Senator from Iowa ought to have added to his statement that when the present Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States was Assistant Attorney General he protested most vigorously against the kind of dissolutions which were being permitted, and because of that protest, probably more than anything else, he was named as Attorney General.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was called to some other matter and I did not hear what the Senator from Missouri was reading. What is the document to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a letter from the secretary to the Attorney General, inclosing a memorandum which the secretary prepared, and in that memorandum is this criticism of his superior officer.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the memorandum? What is the object of it? Is it a letter from the private secretary of the Attorney General to the Attorney General?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh. Has it been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has just asked that it shall be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think this memorandum shows a pretty good record for the Attorney General under the circumstances, since he has been criticized here, and this administration is being attacked.

I notice in this paper that a suit against the telephone company has been prosecuted to a successful conclusion. I notice that the case against the Harvester Trust, in which the Attorney General took part, and which he prosecuted personally, has been brought to a successful conclusion. Decrees have been entered against the Harvester Trust and the Bell Telephone Trust, two of the biggest trusts in the United States. I notice that the Anthracite Coal cases have been tried, and a great many suits have been brought. Suit was commenced in 1913 against the Reading Co. under the antitrust act; also against the Lehigh Valley Railroad and against the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. The Metropolitan Tobacco Co. case has been settled. The great Spool Thread case has been settled and a case against the American Can Co. has been brought. Then there are the Butter and Egg cases, the Oatmeal case, the Toasted Corn Flakes case, the Bicycle Parts case, the Clothes Wringer case, the Plumbing Supplies case, the Kodak case, the Fish case, the Jewelers' Association case, the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association case, the Alaskan Transportation cases, and the Bituminous Coal cases.

As to the Steel case, the memorandum says:

> This is a suit to dissolve the United States Steel Corporation on the ground that it is a combination in restraint of trade. The prosecution of the suit has been conducted vigorously. The testimony has all been taken and the final argument has been set for October 20, 1914.

The Sugar case:

> The suit instituted several years ago against the American Sugar Refining Co., charging it with being a combination in restraint of trade, is being vigorously prosecuted and will shortly be ready for final hearing.

The Lumber case:

> The suit against the associations of retail lumber dealers in the eastern part of the United States, charging them with having entered into a combination to prevent lumber manufacturers and wholesale dealers from selling directly to consumers, was argued before the Supreme Court at the October term, 1913, and was decided in favor of the Government.

The Shoe Machinery case:

> The trial of the suit against the United Shoe Machinery Co. and others, charged with restraining and monopolizing interstate and foreign trade in shoe machinery, was completed in June, 1914, and the decision of the trial court is awaited.

The Keystone Watch case:

> The trial of the case against the Keystone Watch Case Co. and others, for restraining and monopolizing trade in filled watchcases and watches, was completed in June, 1914, and the decision of the trial court is awaited.

Then we have the Steamship Pool cases and the Motion Picture cases. So this document will bear reading and will show that this administration has been very energetic in the prosecution of the trusts. I do not think the criticism made here upon the administration is deserved.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask the Senator how many of the cases he has referred to were commenced under this administration. Were not most of them commenced under preceding administrations?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know the number. A good many of them were begun under the previous administration; but they have been prosecuted to successful conclusion under this administration. That was not done under the last administration. Here is the Bell Telephone case, which has been prosecuted to a successful conclusion, and the Pipe Line case and several others that I could name. So I think the Attorney General has been pretty energetic in this matter.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senators are ready to vote, I shall not delay the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he has addressed the Senate on this amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment was agreed to. I rose to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I understood. I rose for the purpose of offering another amendment.

I move to strike out of the amendment the last clause, reading as follows:

And the Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to control the prosecution.

I wish to say just a few words upon that amendment.

I regret that any attempt has been made here to get credit for or to condemn any administration on the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act or any other antitrust act. I know we will not agree as to which administration is entitled to the most credit and which administration ought to receive the most condemnation in the enforcement or the lack of enforcement of these laws.

It seems to me that the document which the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from North Carolina have been discussing, perhaps offered here as a defense of the present administration, or the administration of the Attorney General who has just been promoted to the Supreme Court, ought to have been offered in executive session, when those who were opposed to his elevation were suggesting reasons why he had not carried on his office as he ought to have done.

I do not believe the question now before the Senate ought to be clouded by getting into a political, partisan discussion as to whether Mr. McReynolds has enforced the antitrust acts as he ought to have enforced them, or whether he has been sufficiently diligent, or otherwise. I do not agree myself that he has been, and I think I could demonstrate to my satisfaction at least that he has not been; but that has nothing to do with this question, and never would have been suggested had there not been an attempt made, apparently, to defend him when no charge was made.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for a question.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to make a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall have to yield for that, if it is good.

Mr. CHILTON. It seems to me this amendment is clearly out of order. I do not want to do the Senator any wrong. I hope the Senator will understand that I do not want to cut him off.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not hear the point of order.

Mr. CHILTON. I have not stated it yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not know but that the Senator had, the way he was talking.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the time the Senator is consuming on the point of order will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. CHILTON. My point of order is this: The Senator from Missouri offered an amendment to the bill. An amendment was offered to that amendment, which amendment to the amendment was agreed to. Upon that there was a vote of the Senate. Now, the Senator from Nebraska moves to strike out the amendment which has been agreed to, or part of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator from West Virginia is in error. The amendment which was agreed to was to insert the words "and expense," as offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CHILTON. I understand. That was an amendment to the amendment. That was voted upon. Now, that amendment has been incorporated in the amendment. It has been accepted and adopted. Now, the Senator moves to strike out that which has been accepted by the Senator who offered the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska is only moving to strike out part of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Missouri, which the Chair construes to be an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CHILTON. Then do I understand that the Senate has not voted to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. CHILTON. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it has been argued here that if we need more assistance in the Department of Justice we ought to employ more lawyers in the Department of Justice, and that this amendment in reality is simply to increase the number of attorneys in the Department of Justice. We must bear in mind, however, that if we should employ 10,000 more lawyers in the Department of Justice every one would be under the supervision of the Attorney General, and properly so. He is the head of that department. No prosecution would be or could be commenced without his consent. The entire activity of all the attorneys under him is subject to his control and to his order. It is no reflection on any Attorney General; and I should like to argue this question on the theory that the amendment itself is not offered as a reflection, and can be under no circumstances considered as a reflection, upon any Attorney General, past or present.

If the Attorney General of the United States is requested by the attorney general of a State to begin a certain prosecution, he will undoubtedly call upon the attorney general of the State for such evidence as he may have, consult with him in regard to the facts, the evidence he has in his possession to prove the case, and discuss the law of the case. I think it is reasonable to suppose that these men will act in harmony. It will not result in some one trying to find fault with the Attorney General. The action of the attorney general of the State in calling the matter to the attention of the Attorney General of the United States will be a favor, assuming that they all want to perform their duty, and I think we ought to discuss the matter on that assumption. If he is too busy, if he has not been able to prosecute with the force at hand, he will undoubtedly often say to the attorney general of the State, "Commence your prosecution," and he will assist him in it.

I presume, if this bill is passed, we will find instances, where cases are commenced by the attorney general of a State, where some of the assistants of the Attorney General of the United States will be with him in the case, assisting him in carrying it on. There may be a case where there will be a flat disagreement between the Attorney General of the United States and the attorney general of a State as to whether there is a violation of law. That does not mean any discredit either to the attorney general of the State or to the Attorney General of the United States. They may disagree. The attorney general of the State may think there is a plain violation of the law, and the Attorney General of the United States may think there is not. Under that state of facts and in the practical operation of this law that will be the only instance where there will be a dispute between the two officials.

Under that condition of things, is it not right for us to say that the attorney general of the State shall proceed and try it out on his theory? His State pays the expenses. He assumes the responsibility. The Government of the United States is not injured. It does not cost the Government of the United States a penny. It is not any reflection on the Attorney General of the United States that the State attorney general disagrees with him. If there is a disagreement, there ought to be some way to try it out. We ought not to be compelled to submit always to the judgment of one man, however honest or able he may be.

There will be in the practical operation of this law, in my judgment, if it is placed upon the statute books, no serious difficulty, no serious dispute, and no reflection on anybody. That being the case, after the Attorney General of the United States, for one reason or another, has declined to prosecute, or has said to the State attorney general: "Go ahead and prosecute under this law," and he does so, and the State goes to the expense, sometimes to a large expense—we have included expense now in the bill by the amendment—when the State goes to the expense, gets ready for trial, gets evidence, and is ready to proceed with the trial under the law that we have passed giving it authority to do so, it seems to me it is perfectly foolish for us to say, after all that is done, that the Attorney General of the United States shall have the power to come in and dismiss that suit. The amendment I have offered to the amendment strikes out that authority, and takes away from the Attorney General the right to dismiss a suit after he has declined to commence it, and after the other party has commenced it and has gotten it into court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall find it necessary to precede my question by a brief statement.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. CUMMINS. The argument of the Senator from Nebraska is very persuasive, and I am not sure but that it is convincing; but there is one point that bothers me about it, and that I should like to suggest to him.

I suppose three-fourths of all the decrees that have been entered under the antitrust law have been consent decrees, often the result of an agreement in the office of the Attorney General of the United States. I have never liked that power. I think it has been misused, and necessarily so. I hesitate to see a similar power given to 49 attorneys general; that is, I have no hesitation in giving them the power to bring and try the lawsuits, for I assume that if the court really tries a case and decides it, it will be decided according to the law and according to justice, but I shrink a little from giving to the several attorneys general of the States the power to enter into negotiations with those who are alleged to have violated a law and finally agree with regard to a dissolution or a readjustment or a reorganization, and thus end the controversy. If I were sure that the case would be carried forward every time to a decision by the courts, I would have no hesitation about it; but I make this suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska, because the thought perplexes me a good deal, so far as that phase of it is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the anxiety of the Senator from Iowa is fully answered by the amendment. That language contained in the language of the Senator from Missouri will still be in the amendment if my motion to strike out these objectionable words is carried. In those cases, if they are commenced by the attorney general of a State, the Attorney General of the United States has the right to be in the case and to be represented in the trial of the case. The language specifically states that. So if, after the attorney general of a State commenced a case he undertook to settle it contrary to what the Attorney General of the United States thought it ought to be, the Attorney General of the United States either in person or through his representative could be in court if he desired and call the attention of the court to the matter and be properly heard to object to any settlement that might be taking place. I do not believe there would be any difficulty in the actual working out of the proposition.

Mr. President, I think this is no innovation, as the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] has suggested. It is very much like quo warranto proceedings provided for in every State, where, for instance, the attorney general of the State is first given authority to try the right of a man to hold office, and if the attorney general does not take action any citizen of the State interested has a right to ask him to commence such an action, and if he declines the citizen commences the action in the name of the State. I presume every State in the Union has laws similar to that. When a citizen commences the suit the attorney general of that State has no authority to come in and dismiss it.

Mr. President, I think those words practically nullify the real good that will come out of this amendment. They make it nugatory. What State or what attorney general of a State would go to the expense and spend the time that would be necessary to get an antitrust case ready for trial, knowing that all the work of the attorney general might be overthrown by the simple dictum of the Attorney General in Washington? It seems to me there can be no reason founded upon justice and reasoning why this power to the Attorney General to dismiss a case that he himself has declined to commence should be given. As I said before, it seems to me that it takes away all the virtue of this amendment. There will be no difficulty in the enforcement of this law. There will be no reflection upon any class of officials, either of the States or of the Federal Government. It simply gives to the States the right to begin this action when the Federal Government has declined to begin. It does not mean that the Attorney General refuses for motives that were dishonorable or that were unfair or that were not right in any other way. It may be that he will decline simply for want of time. It may be that he will decline because he does not believe the attorney general of the State has a good case.

It would often occur that there would be a joining of the attorneys general of several States, and they ought to be given this right when they go to the expense and time and trouble of getting them ready for trial and commence to try them. They will never get them ready unless they are given that right. In my judgment if this language remains in the bill it will mean practically that the law will be a dead letter, because no attorney general would put his State to the expense and trouble of getting an important case of this kind ready for trial, knowing that he is at the mercy of some man who may dismiss the suit without giving any reason for it.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the amendment as it has been perfected up to this time may be stated, together with the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska moves to strike out from the end of the proposed amendment the following words:

And the Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to control the prosecution.

So that, if amended, the whole proposition will be to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 25. That the attorney general of any State may, at the cost and expense of the State, bring suit in the name of the United States, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, to enforce any of the antitrust laws: Provided, That at least 90 days before commencing suit the attorney general of the State has requested the Attorney General of the United States to bring such suit and such request has not been complied with by the Attorney General of the United States; and said Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to appear and participate in said suit with said attorney general of the State.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have not said anything. I think, during the entire debate on any part of this bill or any amendment to the bill. If I could agree that any part of this proposed amendment was worthy of consideration, then I might agree with the conclusion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] as to his amendment to the amendment. I can not vote to perfect it, because to me it can not be perfected. The idea of empowering an attorney general of a State to enforce any of the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States, whether you put the ultimate power in the hands of the Attorney General of the United States or not, to me is absolutely obnoxious.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the keen ear of the Senator from New Mexico heard the last clause of the amendment, that the Attorney General of the United States may appear in conjunction with the attorney general of a State. He can help.

Mr. FALL. Yes, Mr. President; I will say to the Senator that the keen ear of the Senator from New Mexico did catch that permissory clause in the amendment.

Mr. President, I can not understand just exactly what we accomplish by this amendment. I do not propose to debate the proposition. I simply want to say for myself that I shall not vote for a part of it. I can not vote for any part of it, on principle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] requests the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair that I have with the junior Senator from

Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Transferring my general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent from the Senate and that he is paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. FLETCHER. I will transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I will state that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent from the Senate and that in his absence he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—9.

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment to Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the original amendment.

Mr. REED. I ask that the amendment as it now stands be read, and upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. 25. That the attorney general of any State may, at the cost and expense of the State, bring suit in the name of the United States in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties to enforce any of the antitrust laws: Provided, That at least 90 days before commencing suit the attorney general of the State has requested the Attorney General of the United States to bring such suit, and such request has not been complied with by the Attorney General of the United States; and said Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to appear and participate in said suit with said attorney general of the State; and the Attorney General of the United States shall have the right to control the prosecution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only desire to say that I shall vote for this amendment, believing, however, that it amounts to very little more than a declaration of principle. I think that with the concluding clause in it, which the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] sought to strike out, it makes no substantial change in the present condition. It leaves any suit which may be started by the attorney general of any State in the control of the Attorney General of the United States. Knowing that, I doubt whether the attorney general of any State would start a suit unless it was with the consent of the Attorney General.

However, the general idea of widening the instrumentalities for the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law, well expressed in the amendment, is a good one, and I shall vote for it on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been demanded and properly seconded. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair again to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I desire again to announce my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I am assured, however, that if the Senator were here his vote upon this amendment would be in accord with my own. I therefore feel at liberty to vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—21.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment on page 41 of the printed amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That no corporation, except a common carrier, the capital and surplus of which exceeds $100,000,000, shall be permitted to engage in interstate commerce.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can say all I want to say on this amendment in, I think, three minutes. This will end such institutions as the Steel Trust. I think it will only affect that one institution, but if there is another ouside of the common carriers in this country that has a capital of more than $100,000,000 it ought to be terminated. In some 12 States of the Union there is a limit upon the amount of capital which corporations may have or upon the capital which certain corporations may have. There is no excuse for the existence in this country of an institution larger than one which has a capital of $100,000,000. Whenever a corporation goes beyond that in its size it becomes in fact a monopoly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the National Government a right to limit the capital of a State corporation?

Mr. REED. I think it has the right to limit the capital of any institution that proposes to engage in interstate commerce and that does engage in interstate commerce. If we do not possess that right, then half the legislation we are now enacting will fall of its own weight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and ask that this statement stand for the day.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. LEA of Tennessee was called). The occupant of the chair again announces his pair and its transfer and votes "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when Mr. VARDAMAN's name was called). The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been compelled to leave the Chamber on account of the condition of his health. In his absence he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair and its transfer which I made on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—16.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment printed at pages 43 and 44 of the printed amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That whenever a corporation shall acquire or consolidate the ownership or control of the plants, franchises, or property of other corporations, copartnerships, or individuals, so that it shall be adjudged to be a monopoly or combination in restraint of trade, the court rendering such judgment shall decree its dissolution and shall to that end appoint receivers to wind up its affairs and shall cause all of its assets to be sold in such manner and to such persons as will, in the opinion of the court, restore competition as fully and completely as it was before said corporation or combination began to be formed. The court shall reserve in its decree jurisdiction over said assets so sold for a sufficient time to satisfy the court that full and free competition is restored and assured.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I again read this statement coming from the Attorney General's office.

The fundamental weakness in the enforcement of the antitrust act in previous administrations was the failure to insist upon a real dissolution of monopolies and combinations which the courts had adjudged unlawful.

I do not read that in order to criticize any past administration and do not present it from any partisan motive. The great trouble in the enforcement of one of these laws is that after the violator has been finally brought to book he then begins to appeal in the names of the widows and orphans—the fictitious and invisible widows and orphans—who are alleged to own stock in the concern; he begins to appeal against the thought of disturbing business. Accordingly it has been true that the dissolution of trusts in the past has frequently resulted in merely producing a number of other trusts, and the stock of the corporation has actually risen in value upon the market.

Mr. President, I want to invite the serious attention of the Senate to this amendment. This provision only applies where there is a final judgment; it does not interfere with a possible settlement; but when there has been a final judgment, the decree provides for the appointment of a receiver and the actual, good-faith dissolution of the combination. That may seem revolutionary to some of you; but I call your attention to the fact that in 28 States of this Union they have a similar provision for the violation of their antitrust acts. It is a principle that has been recognized in all of the States that I have referred to. Therefore, I think it ought to be placed in this proposed law.

Besides, I think it ought to go into this law, so that hereafter when we shall prosecute a combination and shall gain the suit there shall be a real and not a pretended dissolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment printed on page 45 of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section, after the one just agreed to, the following:

SEC. —. That whenever any corporation shall be convicted of a violation of any of the antitrust acts the court shall assess against said corporation a fine not less than 10 per cent of the full value of the assets of said corporation or consolidation and shall assess against it the costs of the suit. The fine and costs aforesaid shall be paid out of the interest of the officers, directors, and agents who have aided, advised, or consented to the illegal acts of such corporation or combination, if sufficient, and if not, the deficiency shall be paid out of the other assets of the corporation and the balance of the funds shall be disposed of by the court in accordance with the law applicable in such cases.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think this is an important amendment; I think it is a sound amendment. Of what use is it to fine a corporation $5,000 that has made $5,000,000 by the combination? Of what use is it to say to the corporations of this country, "We impose upon you the penalty of a fine," when you make the fine a mere bagatelle? A man can organize a $10,000,000 or a $100,000,000 monopoly; he can run it for 10 years; he can be brought finally to book; he may have his corporation convicted; he can in the meantime have made $10,000,000 or any other sum, greater or less; and the power of the court in levying a fine against that corporation is limited to a pitiable $5,000. That sort of penalty is no penalty; that sort of penalty has never stopped a trust in its organization for one minute; it has never arrested its progress for a second; but add a penalty of this kind and the gentlemen who sit on boards of directors or who sit back of boards of directors, and who figure that if there is a criminal responsibility attaching to any man connected with a trust they will be so far off they can not be reached and afterwards sent to jail—these gentlemen will at least see the prospect of heavy financial loss, and they will hesitate about proceeding in a course in violation of the law.

Mr. President, I offer the amendment without further argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. Let us have a roll call.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of MR. LEA of Tennessee was called). The present occupant of the chair again announces his pair and its transfer and votes "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I announce my pair and its transfer as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I announce the necessary absence on account of the condition of his health of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. In his absence he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I also announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. STONE].

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Borah	Jones	Norris	Thompson
Chamberlain	Lane	Poindexter
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Reed
James	Martine, N. J.	Shields

NAYS—36.

Fall	Nelson	Smith, Mich.	Works
Goff	Newlands	Smith, S. C.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a few moments ago, in discussing the amendment which I offered limiting the capital of corporations engaged in interstate commerce other than common carriers, I stated that I thought the amendment would apply only, perhaps, to the Steel Trust and one or two others. I have a list, which has been handed to me by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], of the corporations which will be affected by this amendment. I do not claim that the list is necessarily complete, but inasmuch as it is an interesting list, I ask to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Amalgamated Copper Co	$198,000,000
American Smelting & Refining Co	100,000,000
American (Bell) Telephone Co	391,000,000
Brooklyn Rapid Transit Co	170,000,000
Central Leather Co. (70 per cent of tanneries of United States)	112,000,000
Chile Copper Co	111,000,000
Consolidated Gas Co. of New York	150,000,000
Consolidated Lake Superior Co	117,000,000
Consolidated Tobacco Co	502,000,000
Great Northern Iron Ore Co	150,000,000
International Harvester Co	140,000,000
International Merchant Marine Co	179,000,000
Metropolitan Securities Co	224,000,000
Philadelphia Co. of Pittsburgh	100,000,000
United States Leather Co	130,000,000
United States Steel Co	1,490,000,000
Western Union Telegraph Co	121,000,000

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senate that I have taken much of its time and imposed greatly upon its patience, but I am through offering amendments to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 14 the following:

And where, in such suit, necessary and proper defendants reside in different districts, the plaintiff may file his action in either district, and thereupon the court may make an order for service upon nonresident defendants, and service may be made upon them as in the cases provided for in section 57 of the Judicial Code.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to direct the attention of the members of the committee to the amendment. It seems to me that there can be no possible objection to the amendment. It involves a matter of considerable consequence, which I think ought to receive attention.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator allow the Secretary again to state the amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to ask the Senator if the same matter is not covered by section 10 of the bill, and also by section 13?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how section 10 would cover it. I desire to say to the Senator that this amendment is intended to correct an evil in connection with section 14 under which any person, firm, corporation, or association is given the right to sue in certain cases. It is intended to remedy a defect that would exist without this amendment or a similar one, where defendants reside in several different districts and service can not be had upon them.

Mr. CHILTON. I believe that is covered now by the bill, although, so far as I am concerned, the amendment is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I offered the amendment because of a suggestion made to me concerning a case which has actually arisen.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that, so far as I am concerned, and so far as the members of the committee with whom I have had an opportunity to consult are concerned, we are willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. With that understanding, I am ready for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which will be found on page 15 of the compilation of amendments. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 7 it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws of the United States shall be construed to forbid the creation, existence, and lawful conduct of labor or other organizations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or being conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of any such organization from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects and purposes thereof; nor shall such organizations, when lawfully conducted, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few words will enable me to make the suggestion I have to make as to this amendment. I take it that no Member of this body for a moment would give assent to the proposition that labor organizations should be restrained from organizing or conducting their business for lawful purposes as laid down in this amendment and in the text of the bill. Certainly, I have been astounded to hear it even suggested that any judge of any court at any time has decided that a labor organization was in violation of the antitrust laws or in restraint of trade. The first provision in this proposed amendment is:

That nothing contained in the antitrust laws of the United States shall be construed to forbid the creation—

That is, the organization—existence, and lawful conduct of labor or other organizations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or being conducted for profit.

The second proposition is:

Or to forbid or restrain individual members of any such organization from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects and purposes thereof.

The third proposition is:

Nor shall such organizations, when lawfully conducted, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

So, Mr. President, this amendment provides that not only labor organizations but other organizations having the laudable purpose in view of mutual help, and not having capital stock, can be formed and can be conducted under the law; that they shall not be restrained from the legitimate objects and purposes of their organization if they are being lawfully conducted; and that they shall not be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws, provided they are lawfully conducted.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is all that any labor organization could ask for, and that it absolutely covers every legitimate demand that could be made upon Congress so far as legislation is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in just what particular the proposed substitute differs from what is already in the bill? I think probably we have adopted some amendments to section 7 that do not show. I am not sure that we have.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that section 7 be read with the amendments, if any, that have been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read section 7 of the bill.

Mr. CHILTON. As amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. That is not all.

Mr. CULBERSON. Those are not all the amendments that were agreed to. An amendment was also agreed to providing that violations of any law of the United States should not be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary advises the Chair that that is not on the section as amended.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is another section.

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary was interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary announces that he has finished reading the section as amended.

Mr. CULBERSON. Upon reflection, I think the Secretary is right. These words were inserted in section 18.

Mr. OVERMAN. To be sure; that is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. The difference between the amendment, as I read it, and the one that has just been reported is that it extends the privilege of organization to any persons who desire to organize for the purpose of mutual help, the organization not having capital stock or being conducted for profit; and it does not limit it to labor, agricultural, and horticultural organizations. As an illustration, I know of no reason why the men who contend for an open shop should not have the same privilege in regard to organizing and conducting their business legally that the members of a labor union have.

Mr. NORRIS. They would have under either amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should say not, as this simply names three classes of people who may organize.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator whether that kind of an organization would not be a labor organization?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should hardly think so.

Mr. NORRIS. What kind of organization would it be, if not a labor organization?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, we will admit that. We will say that the open-shop laborers could organize; but there is another class of people who were named in the original bill, and afterwards stricken out—the consumers. I know of no reason why the consumers of this country should not organize to keep down inordinate profits on the part of those who are selling the necessaries of life.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. I voted against striking out those words. I think they ought to have remained in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they ought to have remained in the bill, and I could enumerate half a dozen classes of people who might organize with equal propriety with farmers or horticulturists. It is inconceivable to me that those two classes of people should be singled out and should be granted this privilege and a great many other classes of people who might be named should be denied the privilege. I can not understand it; so my amendment says "other organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or being conducted for profit."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, it is an anomaly of section 7 that they have included farmers or agricultural societies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. My home is in one of the great agricultural States of this Union, and I have not had a letter or a request from a single farmer in the State of Minnesota who wants this legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. NELSON. It has been sandwiched in there to give a little color of reasonableness to the other branch of the case; but there is not a single farmer in the State of Minnesota—and I am proud of it—who wants any right different from that of any other American citizen.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I remind the Senator from Minnesota that these are not farmers' organizations; these are agricultural organizations; and there is a very great difference between an organization of farmers and an agricultural organization, or, at least, there may be a very great difference.

Mr. NORRIS. They are all included in the substitute offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to his colleague?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask my colleague a question. Under section 7 as it stands in the bill the members of organizations are exempted from being held to be combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. I observe that my colleague omits the members from this paragraph, so that members of labor organizations, not acting as the organization but acting independently of it, might be held to be establishing a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and therefore might be prosecuted under the antitrust laws. I ask my colleague if he means his amendment to have that effect?

Mr. GALLINGER. I gave consideration to that matter, and yet if I am wrong about it I have no objection to including it. Wher the section says that such organizations, when lawfully conducted, or the members thereof—that is, the individual members—shall not be held or construed to be illegal combinations, I can not for the life of me understand how the individual members could be an illegal combination, and for that reason I dropped it out.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think I ought to inform my colleague that such an amendment would be very distasteful to the labor organizations of New England, and that, in my judgment, if that is left out, members of labor organizations acting outside of the official votes of the organization might be held to be conspirators in restraint of trade. I so construe it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to give a little more of my time to my colleague to explain exactly how that would operate. Just what are these individual members going to do?

Mr. HOLLIS. Is that question addressed to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. The members acting outside of the organization might say that they would exercise peaceful persuasion to prevent men from going to work. If they did that, two or more of them, and it resulted in restraint of trade, as it probably would, they might be held to be a combination in restraint of trade. That is one illustration. Many others might be given.

They would be acting lawfully if they acted individually, but would be in conflict with the antitrust laws if they acted together.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not quite see the force of that; but however that may be, I will ask that those words may be included in my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I refer to the words that are in the original text. Let them be placed in the amendment. I do not think there is much force to it, but possibly there is. I will say frankly that I have no disposition at all to embarrass these associations or the members of the organizations in doing anything that is legitimate or that is lawful—not the least in the world.

I will ask that the amendment may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the substitute as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the words "conducted," in line 9, it is proposed to insert "or the members thereof," so as to read:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws of the United States shall be construed to forbid the creation, existence, and lawful conduct of labor or other organizations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or being conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of any such organization from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects and purposes thereof; nor shall such organizations, when lawfully conducted, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I am ready for a vote. I have no disposition to prolong the controversy. I will ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). My pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] does not extend to labor-union matters. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. LEA of Tennessee was called). The present occupant of the chair announces his pair and its transfer, and votes "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—17.

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment, or rather to call up an amendment I have already offered to section 9. It is on page 12 of the old print and is in section 9. It is on page 12 of the new print and is in section 10 of the new print. My amendment is to strike out the word "general," before the word "agent," on the seventh line of section 9, on page 12, of the old print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that that amendment having been already agreed to, the amendment will have to be reconsidered before the Senator's amendment can be offered.

Mr. WHITE. Section 9 has been agreed to? I do not think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is trying to amend an amendment that has been agreed to. If the Senator voted in favor of the amendment, he will have to move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WHITE. It is to strike out the word "general." The Senator will find it in the old print on page 12, line 7, before the word "agent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 7, before the word "agent," it is proposed to strike out the word "general," so that it will read "or agent of."

Mr. CULBERSON. That amendment, as stated by the Chair, has already been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama move to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; I move to reconsider it for the purpose of offering my amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can not the Senator offer it in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He can.

Mr. WHITE. I will say to the Senator that I should like to do it now. I have some other engagements. I have waited all day.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well. In view of the statement of the Senator, the committee will accept the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 7, before the word "agent," it is proposed to strike out the word "general."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. It has been accepted.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield, and to whom?

Mr. WHITE. I just wish to say that the amendment has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it has to be accepted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to; and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to section 10. It is found on page 35 of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 2, after the word "bid," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That in case of emergency said purchases may be made without complying with the said requirements.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Who is to determine the emergency?

Mr. POMERENE. I take it that would be a question to be determined from the facts in the particular case.

Mr. GALLINGER. And who is to determine it?

Mr. POMERENE. It would be a question to be determined by the court if it should be raised. I am not sure that I would object to having it determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the legislative situation.

Under this section if a corporation sells to a common carrier $50,000 worth of material or supplies the common carrier is obliged under any and all circumstances to advertise for bids if there are executive officers common to the vendor and the common carrier.

Now, everyone knows that every company is often confronted with emergencies which require it to act immediately. For instance, a year ago last March we were visited in Ohio and Indiana by that awful flood which brought devastation to entire communities. Railroad property was destroyed overnight that was worth hundreds of thous. nds of dollars, not to say millions of dollars. The railway companies were having difficulty in accommodating their transportation. They were obliged, on the spur of the moment, to order large amounts of supplies, in order to protect their property from being carried away by the great advancing waters. Now, let us see what would be the situation.

If you are to advertise, or, to use the language of the bill, give "public notice" for bids, if you are to send to the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the middle of the night it may be, in order to get permission to buy supplies, what is going to be the effect upon this property? It might be that the railway company would be willing to spend twice or thrice the actual value of the supplies in order to protect their property from further injury. Are we to say that under these circumstances they must advertise or give public notice for bids and accept the lowest bid before they can enter into any contract to protect their property? I feel that we are going pretty far to make a regulation of this kind.

It may be said that under the provisions of this section the Interstate Commerce Commission could take care of that matter by adopting regulations looking to the kind of advertising and the length of time railroads would be required to advertise, but if they ought to have this right from the Interstate Commerce Commission it ought to be recognized directly by the Congress in the enactment of the law. I submit that the common prudence which would suggest a line of action to an individual property holder, to an individual business man, must be exercised by railway companies and common carriers under the circumstances I have indicated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I raised the question simply because it struck me as being a proposition that could not well be made operative. I did not see who was to determine the emergency. We have heard so much about "emergency legislation" that I did not like to have it introduced in every bill we passed.

The proposition itself does not appeal to me. Still it is in the amendment, and I suppose we are going to agree to it; that we are going to compel these corporations to advertise and receive bids for $50,000 worth of supplies. They have gotten along pretty well in the past, I think, in that respect. I do not know what abuses there have been; but if it is to remain in the bill, and the Senator can make his proposition workable, I certainly have no objection to it. If the Senator thinks the mere insertion of the words he has suggested will answer the purpose, I appreciate the point the Senator makes—that there may be a great many emergencies so far as the purchase of supplies for a railroad corporation are concerned. It might not be a flood only; it might be a great accident, or it might be various things. So I do not object to the proposition at all, if the Senator from Ohio himself is satisfied with it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator had been in Ohio during the flood, or shortly afterwards, he would have realized more than I can tell the necessity of some provision of this kind. I am assuming that the amendment which has been adopted by the Committee of the Whole is going to remain in the bill; and, if it does remain in the bill, then there ought to be some recognition of these emergencies which we know do arise.

Mr. GALLINGER. The emergency to which the Senator alludes—and we all know something about it—was met by the fact that we had not then legislation of this kind.

Mr. POMERENE. No; we did not have it at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. They proceeded to purchase their supplies, and I apprehend they did it without any scandal or without any detriment to anybody; but, if we must regulate everything on earth, I suppose it is just as well to regulate the purchasing of supplies by railroad corporations as anything else.

Mr. POMERENE. The thought which the Senator suggested—that we ought to indicate somebody who was to determine the emergency—received my consideration. I recognize the fact that this word "emergency" has a well-recognized meaning. It is not likely to be set aside. A corporation which would seek to evade the law and say that the ordinary condition of affairs constituted an emergency would be subject to the control of the courts.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. In my judgment the Senator from Ohio does not do the amendment full justice. This amendment does not require all railroads to advertise when they purchase supplies or for any other kind of transaction, whether it be banking or contracting or otherwise. It only requires those to give notice who have acquired the terrible habit of dealing with themselves. That is, it only requires those directors who are also directors of the railroad and at the same time directors of the company from which the railroad may be purchasing supplies to get rid of that abuse. It is for that purpose that this amendment was adopted. If the railroad chooses to deal with the world and not with people who are really running the railroad, it does not require any advertisement at all. I use the word "advertisement." I drifted into it because the Senator himself used the word "advertisement." There is nothing like advertisement in the amendment. It simply provides——

Mr. POMERENE. Public notice.

Mr. CHILTON. It simply requires notice to be given under a rule or otherwise as may be prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Even if the railroad, suggested by the Senator, should be one that wanted to buy its supplies in an emergency from a company which had a director common to the railroad it would not take any week or 10 days or 3 days or 2 days to meet the situation. All it would have to do would be to telegraph to the Interstate Commerce Commission and it could in five hours provide a way by which it could give notice. So it could be done in a day. It could be done strictly under a rule prescribed or a regulation prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission within a day.

I submit, sir, that you do not have any kind of an emergency when a railroad will want to buy more than $50,000 from a corporation which has common directors with the railroad inside of 24 hours or 12 hours.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the proposed amendment which was adopted by the committee says that this shall be a public notice. It is not a question of buying $50,000 in a case of emergency. According to this bill, if the companies have had common dealings amounting to $50,000 in a year, they are required to give it.

My good friend refers to the fact that they can get in touch with the Interstate Commerce Commission in a day—in five hours, it may be. During the flood in the State of Ohio I was less than 100 miles from my home, and I was 48 hours in getting into telephonic or telegraphic communication with my home. Are they to stop and not buy supplies under any circumstances until they get in touch with somebody here in Washington? Is it the purpose of this amendment to cripple these common carriers in this way, and therefore to interfere with the transportation system of the country? Let us correct the evil, but let us not tie the hands of common carriers so that they can not take care of their own property in a proper way.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. What was the railroad to which the Senator referred that had the misfortune in Ohio? Take the Baltimore & Ohio——

Mr. POMERENE. The Baltimore & Ohio, the numerous branches of the Pennsylvania system, the Wabash system, the Wheeling & Lake Erie. All of them were affected in that way; that is, all those in the central and southern part of Ohio.

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator will permit me, every one of them has an office in Washington, an office in New York, another in Cincinnati, one in Baltimore, and in Philadelphia and Chicago. In 10 minutes they can get in touch with the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is no railroad business which amounts to anything in the United States that, through its agencies, can not get to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They do get to it, and they have relations with it. They have agents and can get to it through them. This does not say that the depot agent or the conductor on the train must do this, but the general officer or the local officer can attend to it. It is simply intended not to try to break up, but to break up, the abuse of railroad corporations dealing with other corporations in a private way, with which other corporations there is a common directorate or a common management.

You can buy all you please if you do not intend to buy from yourselves. The railroad company can buy everything it wants to buy without giving any notice, without consulting with the Interstate Commerce Commission, unless it chooses to deal with some corporation in the management of which the railroad may be interested. In that case there must be given some kind of notice prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It may be that it may be a day, it may be a week, it may be a month; but it requires that there shall be some notice, so as to give the public an opportunity to know when that kind of a case occurs.

Mr. POMERENE. I recognize the evil which was in the mind of the committee, and I am willing to go any length that is necessary to correct that evil, but I am not willing to produce another evil which must be recognized as an evil because it is certain to come. We are certain to have it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment to section 9 has been adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was reconsidered, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote by which the amendment was agreed to has been reconsidered.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was reconsidered for the purpose of considering an amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE], and then the section as amended was agreed to. That is my recollection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not hear that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Texas is correct. It was reconsidered and then agreed to as amended.

Mr. POMERENE. It was my understanding that the amendment was reconsidered, and I assumed that it was open to further amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Would the Senator be willing to have his amendment considered when the bill reaches the Senate? It is now in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POMERENE. The matter is up now, and I prefer to have it decided. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. There is nothing in order except to call the yeas and nays. The first name on the roll was called, and debate is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no response. The question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted?

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is now before the Senate, and the yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. A request has been made for the reading of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 2, after the word "did," insert:

Provided, however, That in case of emergency said purchases may be made without complying with the said requirement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I make the usual announcement and vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair and transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). With the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—21

Burton	Kenyon	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Lewis	Norris	Townsend

So Mr. POMERENE's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to the amendment, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and I do so because I am guilty myself to some inaccuracies in grammar in the section, and I wish to correct them now. They are purely repetitions. I took it up with the chairman of the committee and other members. It makes no difference in the meaning whatever.

On page 12 of the original bill, page 13 of the last print of the act after——

Mr. O'GORMAN. What section?

Mr. CHILTON. Section 10 as the bill is now in the second print. It is section 9a in the original print.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. On what page of the original bill?

Mr. CHILTON. It is on page 12 of the old bill and line 9. In the new bill it is on page 13, line 2. After the word "association" I move to strike out the four words "or with such person," so that it will read:

With which latter corporation, firm, partnership, or association such common carrier shall—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. In the next line I move to strike out the words "purchases of supplies or articles of commerce or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. In the next two lines I move to strike out the words "with any such corporation, firm, partnership, or association."

The section means exactly the same without these words as with them. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask for the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an amendment on page 33 of the printed amendments. I have modified the amendment, as I will indicate later on in my statement, but it means the same thing in effect. Section 18 provides that—

No restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof—

And then, omitting several lines—unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application.

It will be observed that if this becomes a law property or property rights, if threatened with irreparable injury, would be given the protection of the injunctive writ, and that is the only case in which an injunction could be granted in labor disputes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What is the page?

Mr. POMERENE. Pages 26 and 27 of the bill.

In other words, if the person himself was suffering a physical injury or if the men employed in his factory were suffering or about to suffer a physical injury, neither he nor his men, under the provision of section 18, could be protected against violence or threatened violence; but if the property was threatened, if the property was injured, if a property right was threatened or injured, that could be protected by injunction. In other words, we are placing the sanctity of property and of property rights above persons or personal rights.

It seems to me that the Judiciary Committee had this in mind, because in section 15, on page 24, there was an amendment reported by the committee to the Senate. I read:

No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the applicant.

The Senate committee struck out the words "property or a property right of," and they must have been of the opinion that there were other rights than property rights or the rights of property which ought to be protected. We now have section 15 so phrased that a temporary restraining order may be granted where it would result in irreparable injury, loss, or damage to the applicant. In order to have the two sections consistent it seems to me that either the amendment should be adopted which I proposed the other day, which was to amend the text, so as to make it read: "Unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to person, personal rights, property, or property rights"; or the Senate should strike out the words "property or a property right of," in section 18, so that the text would read: "Unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to the party making the application."

It does seem to me that the committee could not have intentionally left these two sections in the form they now are. I can not conceive that the Congress of the United States are going to pass a law which would protect an old barn by injunction but would not protect men who might be employed in it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator believe that the proper function of a writ of injunction is to prohibit a crime against a person?

Mr. POMERENE. Ordinarily not, unless the conditions are such that injuries are imminent. I recognize the fact that injuries are likely to occur. No one can anticipate just exactly when they are going to occur, but we do know that they will occur. I can not understand why we should say that property is more sacred than person. It is a crime to injure property just as it is a crime to injure a person. It is different, of course, in degree. It is different in its consequences, but the consequences resulting from injury to person or to personal rights are greater than those injuries which will occur to property or to property rights.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And yet, Mr. President, as I have understood heretofore, the function of the writ of injunction has not been to protect a person from crime perhaps about to be committed against the person. I, of course, recognize the fact that we have in criminal procedure a binding over to keep the peace; but I recall no instance where the restraining order of the court has been used to prevent a larceny or to prevent an assault or crime against the person.

Mr. POMERENE. In a case where there are large crowds and there are threatened disturbances, whether it will result in an injury to property or to person in a proper case, of course an injunction should, in my judgment, be granted; but I do not think that the Senator would say that there was any well-considered case where there was threatened injury to either property or to person in which the court would protect the property and not protect the person.

It is with that thought in mind that I have felt that the phraseology of section 18 should be changed so as to conform with the phraseology of section 15 and not put us in the attitude of saying that the Congress had a higher regard for the property right than for the personal right.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator takes his seat, I suppose the Senator recognizes that the court will not issue a restraining order under existing rules, except where irreparable injury is threatened.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WALSH. Did the Senator ever hear the expression "irreparable injury" applied to a person?

Mr. POMERENE. It is, of course, applied ordinarily to property, but I have never known a case where there was irreparable injury threatened or done to property that it would be protected and the persons themselves not protected if they were in imminent danger from the same illegal act.

Mr. WALSH. Is the Senator able to refer us to any case in which the expression "irreparable injury" ever was held to apply to an injury to a person, and will he explain to us what kind of injury to a person would be denominated in the law as irreparable injury to the person?

Mr. POMERENE. I am just advised by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that in the case of issuing blacklist it was stopped by injunction, and rightly so. I can not conceive of a case where there is violence to the person—you may call it irreparable or not—that that violence does not mean more to the injured party than the injury to his property.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The distinction that is made here between section 15 and section 18, in the one case eliminating the words and in the other retaining them, is to meet an argument of Mr. Gompers. Mr. Gompers maintains, and he argued very strenuously before the Judiciary Committee, that the right to do business and the right to labor are not property, and therefore are not entitled to protection by injunction. That is Mr. Gompers's theory, and this was put into the bill to meet that argument.

It is my opinion that the courts will hold that the right to carry on business, the right to run a factory, is property, and if it is interfered with it is an invasion of property rights. But that is not Mr. Gompers's theory, and it was put in here as a sop to encourage and make the labor organizations believe that they are getting something in this section that is not provided for in the other section.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator's view as to what the court would say with reference to the right to carry on business is correct. I have heard the argument advanced that the criminal law is sufficient protection to men and to communities where violence exists. I can not subscribe to that theory. For instance, when a great crowd has gathered and there is intense excitement, and when in the opinion of every fair-minded person who is a witness to the circumstance violence is likely to occur, if it afterwards does occur and some one is shot down, it is a poor consolation to either the man who is shot down or to the friends of that man to say, "You will have an adequate remedy at law by way of an action for damages or by way of sending the accused, if you know who he is, to the penitentiary." It will be a poor balm to the wounds of men or the friends of those injured.

In my judgment—and I say this having in mind a proper case where the circumstances justify it—the use of the writ of injunction to protect the peace, to prevent violence, is a more adequate remedy in the interest of the laboring man himself than to permit violence to go unchecked.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. NELSON. The theory is that a poor man's right to labor is not entitled to protection; but if he happens to have property of any kind, that property right is entitled to protection.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NELSON. That the right to do business or the right to carry on labor is not entitled to the protection of the court by injunction is the theory on which this provision is proceeding?

Mr. POMERENE. And if there be a poor man who has no property, and so forth, he can not, under this section, invoke the right of injunction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio, when he talks about that, will he have the kindness to state to us under what kind of circumstances a man who has not any property at all can go into a court of equity and secure an injunction?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, if there is a plant in a certain locality and unfortunately there is a strike the employers and employees not being able to get together, for one reason or another there may be a threatened disturbance of some kind which may result in injury to property; it may result in injury to the person, one or both—I do not know of any case where the courts have distinguished and said "we will protect the property, but we will not protect the person." I never heard that idea advanced until in connection with this legislation.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] inquired a few moments ago if the Senator from Ohio believed that a court of equity would restrain the commission of a crime, and the Senator from Ohio said that he believed it would not.

Mr. POMERENE. Ordinarily that is true as a general proposition.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Well, I think the statement may be made with every confidence that for 300 years in Great Britain and in the United States no court of equity has ever issued its injunctive process to restrain the commission of a crime, the theory being that the criminal law in itself, with its penalties, is adequate to restrain as well as to punish those committing crime. In all these centuries the only ground upon which a court of equity has ever extended the extraordinary remedy of injunction has been to protect property from a danger that threatened it. In the ordinary strike cases the injunction is granted upon that ground alone, although incidentally reference may be made to prohibiting combinations which may have the effect of destroying or injuring property.

I am led to make this observation only because the Senator from Ohio a moment ago, if I understood him correctly, said he had never heard this distinction made until Congress began to consider this legislation. I simply rose to say that in my judgment—and I think it will be the judgment of the Senator himself on reflection—it has been the law for 300 years.

Mr. POMERENE. Why, Mr. President, there can be no question about the proposition that ordinarily a court will not restrain a criminal act; but the rule is different where there is a threatened multiplicity of acts, where the injury is constant, varied, and general in its character in connection with strikes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But only, if the Senator will pardon me, where such acts are calculated to destroy property.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, well, that may be the basic idea of it; but at the same time the Senator from New York will not maintain, where the injuries to property and persons are concurrent in the same disturbance, that a court will not protect both. That is what I am seeking to have here. I can not conceive that the Congress of the United States is going to say in so many words this desk here may be protected, but I, who stand over this desk, can not be protected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I desire to make a statement.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to state as to the language incorporated in section 15, which states, in substance, that a restraining order may be granted when immediate and irreparable damage will result to the applicant, that in line 19 the words which were stricken out, "property or a property right of," were stricken out to have the language of the proposed statute conform to the specific language adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in its existing equity rules. I will read from those existing equity rules, which are declaratory of the law as applied in the different States of this country. This is rule 73 of the Supreme Court, and I ask Senators to note in connection with it the language adopted in section 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. According to the ruling of the Chair, the Senator from Ohio having yielded to the Senator from New York, the Senator from New York may proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I shall not take that much time. I shall be content to call the attention of the Senate to the provision of rule 73 of the equity rules of the Supreme Court, which reads:

> No preliminary injunction shall be granted without notice to the opposite party. Nor shall any temporary restraining order be granted without notice to the opposite party, unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts, shown by affidavit or by the verified bill, that immediate and irreparable loss or damage will result—

Not to property, because it is unnecessary to state that, but—> to the applicant

The loss to the applicant must be a property loss, which is the idea embraced in the bill as now before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. It is correct, as the Senator from New York has stated, that section 15 of the pending bill follows equity rule 73, lately adopted by the Supreme Court; but let me ask the Senator a question. In section 15 we have omitted, in conformity to the equity rule, the words "property or a property right of." Why do you include them in section 18, and thereby make a distinction? Why do you seek to have a different rule in one case from the rule in the other?

Mr. O'GORMAN. My own individual opinion is that there is no substantial reason for the difference in the phraseology; that the construction of the court will be the same.

Mr. NELSON. In legal effect, then, the meaning of the two is the same?

Mr. O'GORMAN. In my judgment; yes.

Mr. NELSON. Then are you not holding out a false promise by retaining that language in the provision relating to injunctions in labor disputes?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Individually I am not a party to holding out any false hopes.

Mr. NELSON. I did not mean the Senator personally.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am stating my view of the provisions, and in conclusion I wish to state that these two provisions of the act in question do not materially or substantially interfere with existing law on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in order that it may be correctly stated, I will say that the amendment as I now offer it is to strike out, on page 27, in lines 2 and 5, the words "property, or to a property right, of," so that the text will read:

> To prevent irreparable injury to the party making the application—

And so forth.

Mr. CHILTON. That would be page 26, line 22, of the old bill, I will state, so that the Senator's amendment may be correctly understood at the desk.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and its transfer to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent from the Senate. In his absence he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Burton	Martine, N. J.	Pomerene	Weeks

So Mr. POMERENE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out from and including line 21, on page 15, to and including line 2, on page 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

> It shall be unlawful for any person to be, at the same time, a member of the board of directors, or other managing board, or an officer of two or more corporations, either of which is engaged in commerce, and which corporations are carrying on business of the same kind or competitive in character: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers.

Mr. CHILTON. Is that amendment included in the printed amendments?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is. I think the reference by page and lines to the portion proposed to be stricken out is to the original bill as reported by the committee. It begins on line 21, page 15, and strikes out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 2 on page 17. It relates to that portion of the bill which is intended to prohibit a community of directors between competing corporations. It is probably the last effort that I shall make to give some effectiveness to this measure in so far as holding companies and interlocking directorates are concerned.

The bill provides:

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations any one of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000—

Thus in the first lines of the provision all corporations whose capital and surplus do not amount to $1,000,000 are excluded from its operation. I need not say that a very great part of the evil of common directorships will be found in corporations that have a capital of less than $1,000,000. I proceed—engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887.

I have followed the committee bill with respect to the exclusion of common carriers; I make no change in the measure in that regard. I believe that common carriers must be dealt with in another bill and in a way that is not applicable to the ordinary corporation, and therefore I approve, so far as I am individually concerned, the action of the committee and the action of the House in excluding common carriers from this particular provision, although I do not want it to be understood that I believe that there should be a community of directors between competing common carriers; there should not be; but the legislation to forbid that community can not intelligently and efficiently be interwoven with legislation that regulates the ordinary corporation.

I have read now up to the point of describing the corporations that are included in the act. Now mark:

If such corporations are or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors, so that the elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

That is to say—and I have just read the real test—if an agreement between them totally annihilating competition would not constitute a violation of the antitrust law, then the section does not apply. In order to cure the evil of interlocking directorates we must first find corporations that have a capital of a million dollars or more, and then the Government must prove that if there were an agreement between them eliminating all competition it would be a violation of the antitrust law, and not until then could the practice—which we all recognize as a vicious one, as one which insidiously destroys the reasonable rivalry and independence that ought to exist in business be prohibited—not until then do we bring a corporation within the purview of this act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. Why does the Senator add the clause?—

Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect, nor be admissible as evidence, in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not add it; I have stricken that out. I have offered the amendment without that provision, although I think it ought to be included; but there is obviously so large a proportion of the Senators who do not think so that I did not care to encumber this amendment with that provision, and therefore it is not in the amendment.

I assert—and I do so with a good deal of confidence—that it would be a great deal better not to attempt to prohibit interlocking directorates at all than to do it in this half-hearted and feeble way. It will stand in the road of adequate legislation for years to come; it will be accepted as a full performance of our duty in regulating such matters; and if I had my way about it I would a great deal rather not have any provision in the law at all than to have it as now proposed.

I turn now to the amendment which I have offered. The amendment provides that there shall not be a community of directors if the corporations are doing the same kind of business; that is all; and it applies to all corporations engaged in commerce among the States except the two classes I have already enumerated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to ask the Senator whether his amendment would not destroy or impair a great deal of legitimate expansion in business, such as we have had in the West? To take, for instance, a case which the Senator will recognize, St. Joseph, Mo., was originally and still is the center of a great wholesale trade in dry goods and groceries. Much of that trade was expanded into near-by States by the establishment of dry goods and grocery houses in other cities of the Missouri Valley. In many cases the same directors who acted in St. Joseph houses have acted in the newer houses established, and in many cases those houses are in competition with each other, and a legitimate natural expansion of trade in that country has resulted. Yet it seems to me that would be prohibited under the amendment which the Senator has offered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think there are some instances of that kind which would be prohibited. This country has fallen into a certain habit of doing business. It must not be assumed that the business of the country can not be done if that habit is abandoned. I do not at all agree that there would not have been the same development in the business of the Missouri Valley if the prohibition had always existed against a community of directors. The business perhaps would have been done, however, by different persons. There would not have been the close intimacy between the wholesale grocery stores of St. Joseph and of Omaha, or possibly of Kansas City, that there is now; but the development, I think, would have outrun the development we now see. If it is true that corporations which are competing with each other ought to be independent, if each ought to carry on its business for the benefit of its own stockholders, then there ought not to be community of managing officers and directors.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska, who first rose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to continue what I suggested a moment ago. If that had been prohibited a number of years ago, instead of the expansion of trade which I have just described, the trade would have been more centralized than it is now, and concerns probably would have been larger than they are now, because this development in the newer regions would not have occurred. The reason it has been advantageous in the past has been that a man of experience, for instance, in the grocery business, going into a new community and becoming a director there, has been able to gather around him other men of capital who were willing to embark with him because of his knowledge of the business; and it has been a distinct advantage in the development of western enterprise, I am sure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so. The Senator from Nebraska has now described the natural course of monopoly. He has described the precise way in which monopoly is often created. I do not deny that there are some instances in which monopoly or monopolistic power may be exercised to the advantage of the people; but it will be exercised to their disadvantage in so large a proportion of instances that it is the policy of the law to forbid it. I think it is a wise policy, although now and then it will curb and restrain a perfectly legitimate enterprise.

I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just a moment. I think the Senator can hardly say that in any of the cases I have referred to any monopoly has resulted. On the other hand, the gradual course has been a sharp competition and a divorcement between these concerns and men who have originally come into a community in that way and become identified with it; and the result has been very advantageous, as I have stated, to the development of the West.

Mr. CUMMINS. I differ from the Senator from Nebraska, because we have experienced the same thing in our State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I doubt whether the Senator can refer to an instance in which the effect of that process has been to establish monopoly. On the other hand, it has been to develop competition of a very healthy sort.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say that monopoly had been established in the wholesale business at St. Joseph or in the Missouri Valley. I said that the Senator from Nebraska had described the natural, historical method for creating monopoly, and he has. While I know that there are very many estimable people engaged in business of this sort—and I attach no moral guilt at all to them—I believe the course is unwise, and that if we are to forbid interlocking directors at all we ought to do it throughout.

I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to give the Senator a case I know of in my own State. In a little village near where I live, a little village of 100 population, the farmers erected a cotton mill with $50,000 capital. They struggled along and paid no dividends, and saw bankruptcy coming; and they appealed to a successful cotton-mill man in the State and asked him to come down and take hold of that mill and be a director and manager of it. He did so, and the cotton mill is now a great success, and the farmers are receiving dividends. Would the Senator cut that out?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would. In that particular instance it may do no harm, but that is just the way the United States Steel Corporation was organized.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no trust or monopoly there.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has described the very way in which the United States Steel Corporation was organized. Here were a great variety of plants scattered all over the United States, which, it was alleged, were managed inefficiently, and they wanted a great genius and a man of experience to conduct their affairs so that profits could be made out of their operation. So they came to these men who had proven themselves masters of such situations, and they combined through a system of intercorporate stock holdings and interrelated directorships and put the business in the hands of men who had in that way demonstrated their power.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I wanted to get up a manufacturing establishment in my State, I could not sell the stock at all, probably; but if I should tell the people there that a certain man in my State who had been very successful in his business would come in and take some stock and be a director, I could sell the stock at any time. That is the way my State has been built up. Four or five men in the State have met with great success; and people in different parts of the State, knowing of their success, have organized these little corporations all through the State, and have induced these men to come down and be directors in them, and they have gone on and have been successful.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina, with the Senator's permission, if the process he describes is not of itself creating competition—the very thing the Senator from Iowa wants to keep alive?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is exactly what it is doing and what it has done.

Mr. LIPPITT. In confirmation of what the Senator says, I can say that it is the same process which has built up New England. It is the same process which to-day is keeping alive the moderate-sized corporations in New England.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has built up a hundred cotton mills in my State, and they are all competing.

Mr. LIPPITT. It is one of the great safeguards, in my opinion, to limit monopoly. The very process and action that the Senator from Iowa is trying to bring about, instead of doing as he thinks it will do—prevent monopoly and increase competition—is inevitably urging the whole course of business into monopolies and is decreasing and will inevitably decrease competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree, of course, with the Senator from Rhode Island. I know that is his view. If it is true, however, then all the business of this country might as well be in the hands of one board of directors.

I had a discussion at one time with a very eminent financier and constructor, and he told me—he is now dead—that it was his ambition to see all the transportation facilities of the United States united in one board of directors and under the hand of one manager. He argued just exactly as the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Rhode Island have argued, and tried to prove that the people would be immensely benefited and would secure the advantage of the greatest possible efficiency in business.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not yield, because my time is limited. Otherwise, I should be glad to do so.

Mr. LIPPITT. Excuse me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know there are a great many instances in which there are interlocking directors where no one is injured. I am quite willing to admit that there are a great many instances of positive good arising from community of directors. We are legislating for a Nation, however, and if we believe that as a whole, in the great majority of instances, business will be better conducted and the individual better protected if corporations are independent of each other—independent in the management of their business—then we ought to adopt this legislation, even at the expense of the occasional instance in which a benevolent despot has not brought injury upon the people about him.

Why, of course a man may exercise autocratic and absolute power wisely. He may render the people over whom he rules the greatest possible service. His government may be a better government than a government of the people. He may enact better laws, and he may enforce them more efficiently and justly than we may make and enforce in a democracy or in a republic. We have discovered, however, that power of that kind is likely to be abused and that in the great majority of instances it is safer to trust the people themselves rather than a single ruler. Therefore we adhere to democracy and adhere to the republic.

Just so in this respect. Here and there there may be a case in which the monarchy of business is vastly better, but, taking it as a whole, the republic, the democracy, is as sound in business as it is in politics.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before we pass on this amendment I have a word to say. I really think we can best test the advisability of an amendment of this character by reference to concrete cases. I desire to put a couple of such cases to the Senator from Iowa, and I shall be very glad, if I am permitted to do so under the rules of the Senate, to give him as much of my time as he cares to use in which to reply.

Some years ago quite a number of enterprising gentlemen in my State organized a corporation, went across the line into the State of Wyoming, carried on some extensive prospecting there, and discovered oil. They spent something like $40,000 in their explorations. Afterwards, having discovered the oil, they built a refinery, and they are now engaged in mining the oil, refining the product, and selling it in various places in that locality. Now prospects for the discovery of oil are showing up in my own State. Those same gentlemen, encouraged by the success they have had in the neighboring State of Wyoming, are contemplating, we will say, the organization of a similar corporation to carry on similar explorations in my State. Would the Senator like to deny to those people the opportunity to organize another corporation and become the directors of the oil company in Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. WALSH. Let me put another question to the Senator. Quite a good many years ago a gentleman of some considerable enterprise organized a sheep company, took over some farm property, got some sheep, and made something of a success of the business. He was quite familiar with it. He went into another community, bought up another piece of property, and interested other people to put some money in it upon the condition that he would become a director in the corporation, and another, and so on, until now the companies in which he is a director—possibly 8 or 10 of them—produce perhaps one-tenth, possibly one-fifth, of the wool produced in the State of Montana. Out of a total of, say, 30,000,000 pounds, they produce perhaps 5,000,000 pounds. Would the Senator like to pass a law that would prohibit business enterprises of that character?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has already excepted these institutions in the bill for which he stands by fixing a limit of a million dollars upon the corporation which falls within the law, and the smaller ones are not included. If the bill is fair for a corporation of a million dollars and more, it is fair for the corporation of less than a million dollars. I answer him directly, however, in this way:

I think it is wrong for the promoters of the oil wells and oil refineries in Wyoming to go across into Montana and organize another corporation and pretend to compete with each other, with common directors. If the company which was organized in Wyoming desires to go into Montana and sink wells and erect refineries, and in that way enlarge its business, so that the world knows that it is the same company and is not competing at all, but is a unit in the business, there is no objection whatsoever.

Mr. WALSH. But I put to the Senator the case of the majority of the stockholders of the Wyoming company not desiring to engage in the other enterprise, not desiring to take the chances; but the minority go out and induce other people to put in money with them and organize another corporation, and they have common directors.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. The latter they should not have. There is no prohibition here against common stockholders; but a directorate, to be faithful to its stockholders, must not have in view another interest in the management of some other corporation doing a like business and with which competition is being carried on. It is not in human nature to be faithful to both whenever their interests diverge.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

Before doing so, let me say that I look at this question from a somewhat different standpoint from what the Senator does. I look at it from the standpoint of society itself and not from a theoretical standpoint or from what I personally may think is desirable.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator whether he believes that the broad proposition contained in this amendment, which consists in prohibiting the same person from being a director in two competing corporations, is supported by the public opinion of the country? I mean, if there were a referendum on this proposition, if it were submitted to the business men of the country, does he think that they would approve of it, especially in view of the prevailing usages and practices and of the fact, which he admits, that there is no moral turpitude involved in these acts? In other words, does he think that his amendment is in accord with the public opinion, the moral sense, and the sound judgment of the American people?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope I have not obtruded any personal view at all. I think I speak—I hope I speak—from the standpoint of the public welfare, the social and industrial good. I believe that a great proportion of the people of this country insist upon retaining as long as we can the competitive force in our industry and commerce. I believe they think one of the things to be done in order to preserve the competitive force as a regulator of our affairs is independence in management, is freedom from control as between corporations; that where corporations are engaged in the same business and are competing with each other for the favor of their customers they ought to be controlled independently, so that the management of each may do the best it can do for the stockholders whom the management represents.

Therefore I answer that while I may be mistaken, I think the overwhelming sentiment of the American people is against community of directors in competing corporations. There are, of course, exceptions to that statement. There are two classes who are opposed to it: First, the class who believe competition ought to disappear and the Government should be substituted in its stead as a regulator of industry. That is one class. Another class is composed of those people who believe competition has disappeared and can not be resuscitated; that it has gone as one of the lost arts or virtues, if I may so speak of commerce; that there is nothing to take its place except cooperation; and they are willing to cooperate to any degree that the law will permit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must make another ruling. Under the unanimous-consent agreement it certainly is not possible for one Senator to yield his time to another Senator. The unanimous-consent agreement either is to be kept or is not to be kept.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say, in answer to this amendment, that the history of the development of the manufacturing industries of the South is most remarkable. Perhaps the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] remembers that when his father lived in my State there was not one cotton mill there. I remember that 40 years ago there was one cotton mill, known as the E. M. Holt cotton mill, making what was known as the old Alamance plaids. It was very successful. In a community some 10 miles away the citizens concluded they would erect a cotton mill of a similar character, and they induced Mr. Holt to take stock in that mill and become a director. He became a director of that mill, and it became a great success. Then another mill was established, and he became a director in that, until he was a director in five great mills. Now he is dead and gone, but his children are there, and these mills have all been successful.

In another section of the State there was another skillful man, a man of great ability, a man who has done more to develop the industries of our State than any other man. He established a mill, and other communities asked him to come, because of his success, and take charge of this mill and that mill, and he did so, and they have been successful. I have known, time and again, instances where a cotton mill or a woolen mill would go into the hands of incompetent men and almost into bankruptcy, and they would ask one of these leading men in the State to go and take charge of the mill, and they have done so, and have brought it from bankruptcy to being a great success.

Now, why do we want to break that down and destroy it? That is so not only in North Carolina, but it is so in Georgia; it is so in South Carolina, and throughout the South the development has gone on by this means. I do not see why we want to strike that down and stop these men from developing our southern country. It is so not only in the South, but it is so in Iowa, and it is so everywhere they have industries.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has been generous enough to make reference to my early knowledge of the cotton industry in North Carolina. I will say, yes; I have some little knowledge of it, but I do not believe it has been necessarily the privilege of these men combining that has made that result.

Why, great heavens! I remember when it took us two hours and a half to go from my home in New Jersey to New York. It now takes us 45 minutes. Competition did not bring that about. It was the natural evolution of the time; it was the growth of the age and the general enterprise of our people.

At the time referred to by the Senator from North Carolina the United States had a population of fifty-five or sixty million people. To-day we have 85,000,000 people. This did not come about from the privilege of combination. It was the natural, great evolution of the times. The world moves, and I say it would have moved faster and infinitely better had it not been for the privilege of these men combining in a nefarious way for their own profit.

My friend here remarked yesterday that there was a wonderful development of the towns in North Carolina; that these men from Grand Rapids, I think, came there with their overflowing cash, and invested. Why, great Lord! do not delude or flatter yourselves that they came there because they loved you. They did not come there for any such purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think they did.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They did not come there for their health. They went there because they had a good, fat goose to pluck; and they plucked you, and they continue to pluck you.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have not plucked anything.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is regrettable that the enterprising people of North Carolina did not find it within their hearts and minds to develop that industry themselves. You speak about gas plants. Why, great heavens! a community is a thousand years behind the times that does not own its own gas plant and its own electric-light plant, and the profits should come to yourselves. You would have been even better off then than you are to-day.

I am in favor of the Cummins proposition. I hear you talk with regard to what great results have come. In my town in Plainfield, N. J.—a most beautiful and thrifty country, enterprising to a degree—I know a certain lumber yard. I go there to buy lumber. I have bought very considerable amounts of lumber in my life. The price, for some reason, is jacked up. Three miles below me to the east is another town. I say, "I will go there." The price is jacked up. Then I think I will go to the west. The price is up there, too. I wonder why for a stretch of 25 miles in a populous community these things are all up on a line and a par. I learn that Mr. Smith, of Plainfield, became a large owner in the lumber yard at Fanwood, and I find that in Fanwood the people are interested in the lumber yard at Cranford, and those on the west have done the same thing. I claim that it is the evil of the times.

Let us take the argument of my friend the Senator from Montana and those on the other side of the Chamber who are maintaining this side of the question. It seems to me that if you are correct now, great heavens! you must have been incorrect or else ungenerous, untrue, and unfair when you were contending against so-called monopoly. What in the name of heaven becomes of our plea for abolishing monopoly? It has been as empty as a shell if to-day you are advocating the same policy to bring about the same results.

I believe that this amendment will in a way at least aid in restoring competition. I shall vote for it. I hope my colleagues will do so. I believe the evil of a great bank combination that stifled competition in the great metropolis of this country—New York—and the insurance companies as well, all combined to the general detriment and against the well-being of every man, woman, and child in this fair land.

I say that this is not a partisan measure, but it is an American measure, urged on, I believe, from the one motive of advancing the general welfare and restoring competition among fair men in this fair country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this particular feature of the bill at all, and I do not propose to discuss it at any length at the present time. I do want to say, however, that until I came to this body, four years ago, I was entirely engaged in business operations. During that time, for 25 years at least, I think there has not been a single year that I was not a director of three or four different corporations on which, under the provisions of this bill, I would have been prevented from serving.

Since the question of interlocking directorates has been brought up I have carefully gone over in my mind to see if I could remember any meeting of any of those boards of directors when any question came up that would be in any way such as this bill seeks to prevent, and I can not remember any such time.

The ordinary purpose of a board of directors is not, as the Senator from Iowa apparently has in mind, casting votes or taking measures for the purpose of accomplishing monopoly. The last thing that the directors or the stockholders of an ordinary business corporation have in their minds is to entirely eliminate competition by anything that they can do or to establish a monopoly. Therefore to undertake to make laws applying to every corporate business in this country, from the sole aspect of what they might do and without regard to what they actually are doing, seems to me very ill advised. It seems to me ill advised in this case, because it will be, in my opinion, a very great blow at the efficiency of the small corporation.

We have in this country times when we have apparently a sort of unanimous agreement of the people to discuss certain forms and aspects of questions. Just at this minute we are talking a great deal about competition and restraining competition. Two or three years ago we were talking a great deal about efficiency. We had reports from the tariff commission in which they dwelt a great deal upon efficiency. We had a Member of the other House who has been appointed a member of the present Cabinet who was very fond of discussing efficiency. For the time being efficiency seems to have gone out of people's minds, but I want to say that, in my opinion, formed after a quarter of a century's experience with the matters and things which I am discussing, the greatest source of efficiency for the modest and moderate-sized corporations in this country is that very interlocking of directorates which the Senator from Iowa seeks to prevent.

It is a source of efficiency, because a man can not be as good a director who serves only one corporation as when he has the training and experience that comes from association with three or four boards and three or four collections of different minds engaged in the same class of business and has the benefit of a circulation of knowledge from one group of men to another—a circulation of the technical knowledge of their business and of the conditions of trade. The Senator from North Carolina has spoken of cotton manufacturing in his State. The questions that come up before such business meetings are questions of whether it is a wise time to buy cotton, whether it is a wise thing to adopt this kind of a technical equipment or that, and similar questions. The men who meet and study those questions at one board of directors and meet the views of the men who compose it carry the wisdom thus acquired to other boards that they are members of, and the knowledge of all those technical questions thus becomes disseminated and a better judgment is formed upon them.

The Senator from Iowa spoke of the danger of having a man on two boards of directors, because he can not properly serve the stockholders of those two companies. Let us see what that involves, if it is true. It involves, in the first place, that the stockholders who selected the director are not intelligent enough to know whether they are electing a good man or not. It is implied in the assumption of the Senator from Iowa that that man will be able to involve the entire board in some vote and the corporation itself in some actions that would be injurious to them. If he is going to do anything of that kind, it involves either some incompetency or some treachery on the part of every other member there is on the board. It not only involves insincerity and dishonesty on the part of the director himself, but it involves a collusion on the part of every other member on that board.

Further than that, the Senator from Iowa, as a reason for his amendment, says that it is for the purpose of retaining competition. It seems to me that the way to retain competition is to keep alive in some way the smaller corporations, the moderate-sized corporations. Gentlemen will remember that on the bill to establish a trade commission I proposed an amendment which I thought would go a long way toward keeping alive the moderate-sized corporation.

I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Iowa or any other Member of this body who believes it is desirable to keep such corporations alive, but I think this proposition of refusing to those corporations the best ability that they can obtain on their board of directors, for the purpose of promoting their efficiency, is an additional strong step toward compelling the dissolution of small corporations and the gradual absorption of their business by the larger corporations.

It seems to me like a very simple proposition. A board of directors or other men on the United States Steel Corporation control in round numbers one-half the entire steel business of this country. It is not necessary for them to be directors in two or three or four corporations to control the enormous amount of business they do control. They accomplish that result by being directors of one single corporation. On the other hand, take the 200 corporations that are engaged in the steel industry outside of the United States Steel Corporation, if that is the number, and I believe it is somewhere in the neighborhood. If every one of those 200 corporations has to obtain separate and distinct individuals for their boards it naturally follows that they can not all have the same ability and skill that will be concentrated in the board of the great company that they have to compete with. It takes away from them a large part of the knowledge and ability they should obtain to assist them in the very competition that we want to keep alive.

The only reason which I see that is given for prohibiting this efficiency is the fact that they may endeavor to restrain trade or that they will be dishonest toward the stockholders whom they represent.

I know there is no use for me to discuss this proposition at length. I only want to say that as the result of my experience, and my experience has been considerable, I never have come in contact with an occasion when such questions were being discussed at the meetings of the boards of directors that I have sat with. It is not the small corporations who are bothering themselves with these questions to any extent, but they do need all the efficiency they can get, and this amendment will decrease it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not know whether the prospect of the adoption of this amendment is good or not. The force with which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] urges it and the unlooked for support of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] admonish me that there is a possibility of its being adopted. I think if it is adopted it will operate to do two things which are not desirable. One is to discourage investments in private enterprise, and the other is to put a premium upon dummy directors. I think both these results would be unfortunate.

I recall in my State numerous industries where there are interlocking directorates. Our furniture business has interlocking directorates, and yet it is perfectly legitimate. Our beet-sugar business has interlocking directorates. It takes $600,000 to establish a sugar factory. We have 12 or 14 of them in the State of Michigan. The men who put their money into those enterprises did it because they had faith in the Government and faith in the business and faith in their own business management.

Is it possible that you are now going to withdraw the right from these men to manage their own affairs and at a time when their industry is in peril? What are you doing to encourage investment in labor-employing enterprises? Can you expect men of means to engage in industrial pursuits, investing money saved in life's activities, and give them no direct voice in the management and control of their affairs? I think not. Capital should be encouraged to enter such fields and thus develop the latent resources of our land.

Efficiency in the management of any industry is a cardinal necessity if it is to be profitable. You have already toned down our customhouses at the border with one hand and now seek to imperil investments with the other.

I think that this is a sweeping, a far-reaching, and an undesirable amendment, and it ought not to be adopted. What would the domestic sugar business do under present conditions without efficiency and economy in management?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can not see how this interferes with efficiency.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will tell the Senator how it interferes. It interferes to this extent, that a half dozen men who put three or four or five million dollars into domestic industry, perhaps located in different parts of the State and organized into separate units, but controlled practically by the same money source, are not permitted to manage their own affairs. I think it would strike a deadly blow at efficiency and greatly increase the overhead charges.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is predicated upon the theory that men are going to invest money in private enterprise merely for the sake of entering the commercial race and competing with somebody. There never was a more erroneous idea. People invest money in private enterprise because they expect a fair return on their investment, and if by cooperation with one another in the management of its various branches they are able to reduce the overhead charges and minimize the cost of production, they can compete with their rivals and employ labor, and their industry will thrive and prosper.

To-day the sugar industry of my State is menaced. It is in the hands of a very few men, mostly men who made their money out of other enterprises, saved it, and invested in this new industry. The highest skill is required to make it a success; and you now propose to take the management out of the investors' hands and turn it over to strangers.

You have torn down the customhouses partially; at least you have torn the roof off. You have opened the back door and the front door for unlimited competition, and you are allowing an institution incorporated under foreign law and operating in a neighboring island to have access to your markets unrestrained, with the highest skill, the most complete management in charge of their affairs, and, as though drunk with power, you are now seeking to forge fetters for your own countrymen while at the same moment you are putting a premium upon the skill and the efficiency of foreign labor and foreign production and aggregated capital.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In the light of the present price of sugar, it being jacked up to 7 cents a pound, does not the Senator think it has been a most beneficent act upon the part of the Democratic Congress to the people? What would the price be if you had the opportunity to carry out your original idea of protection? Sugar instead of being 7 cents would probably be 9 cents, and to-day the great public consumer would have been paying tribute to these five satellites that are rich to gluttony in your State of Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the theories of my honored friend from New Jersey had been in practice these domestic factories would never have been established and there would have been no competition in that useful article of necessity. In such an event, the price of sugar to-day would be a foreign price, and you would be absolutely impotent to control it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is theoretical.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, right at our border are the most highly efficient sugar producers in the world. They have a productive capacity of more than twice the ability of our people to consume. You are going to allow them to form every plantation in the island of Cuba into a single corporation doing business as freely with the American people as though they resided upon our coast or upon the Great Lakes. Having done this, do you tell me that now it is the function of the American Congress to forge new fetters for American industry and to discourage the investment of capital which employs American labor at good returns? No, Mr. President; that will not benefit our country or get the results you seek to obtain.

I would not discourage capital. We have already pressed it too far, and even idleness may become preferable to tyranny. Some day capital may refuse to employ labor under these conditions, and no law that an American Congress can pass can force capital into enterprises against its will.

The thing to do that will make our country most prosperous, give the largest employment to labor, diversify the productions of our blessed country, is to allow men of means who are willing to thus employ it to get into remunerative industry. I know of no industry to-day, in the State of Michigan at least, whose returns the people have any special right to criticize. I know, of course, there are some large industries which, because of superior efficiency, are making large returns upon the capital and genius which originally promoted their incorporation, but gradually those who are making the money are becoming tired of it and are passing it back to labor in profit-sharing enterprises; and I am glad that this is one of the principles of modern-day industrialism.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In that I share with you all the delights and glories.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My friend from New Jersey is both generous and humane, but if I were to share everything that the warm-hearted Senator from New Jersey were to offer me, I am afraid I would not now be engaged in addressing the Senate. But, be that as it may, industrial enterprise needs encouragement; it does not call for strait-jackets and fetters. This is a poor time to throw javelins at our industrial captains, who are, for the most part, now engaged in a life and death struggle for industrial supremacy.

I can see great harm and danger to result from the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, although I know that his purpose is wholesome and patriotic. But this is not a time to put new fetters upon the development of domestic industry. This is a poor time to carry out refined theories of government in conflict with the everyday experience of mankind.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the argument made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] that there could be no efficiency unless you had interlocking directorates amounts to nothing more than this, that in order to have efficiency you must have combination between different corporations; in other words, there must be that restraint of trade and of competition which lies at the very bottom of every monopoly and trust ever created. The argument goes that far and no farther; it begins there and it ends there. It is the argument that has been on the lips of every trust magnate and every trust promoter from the day that a trust was first conceived in the brain of man.

The argument of my beloved friend, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] about sugar and about the customhouses amounts to nothing more than this: He tells us we have torn down the customhouses, and that we are now about to tear down the business back of them. We have opened the doors of the customhouses, and we are now trying, not to tear down the business back of them, but to stop the criminal practices that grow up back of the closed door of the customhouse. We are endeavoring to destroy the monopolies which were created by a system that was dictated primarily by monopoly and that was kept upon the statute books of the United States as a fraud and false pretense put upon the American people.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan spoke about coordinate cooperation of corporations. Coordinate cooperation of corporations means coordinate combination of corporations, and coordinate combination of corporations means monopoly in restraint of trade and a violation of the criminal section of the Sherman Act. All you need to do is to couch these arguments in their proper terms, and call things by their right names, and you ascertain at once that they are arguments against every law that can be proposed for the protection of the people against the exactions of monopoly. If these arguments be sound, then we ought to wipe out every antitrust law we have upon the statute books. The captains of industry—who might more properly be called by the name Mr. Roosevelt coined, these malefactors of commerce—of course, run everything in a very efficient way for themselves, but unfortunately they do not run them in an efficient way for the rest of the people.

I deny that there is only one board of directors capable of managing business affairs in this country; I deny that you must have interlocking directorates and tie corporations together by a common ownership in order that we shall have efficiency in our manufactures. I assert that that kind of policy destroys the genius of the American people; closes the door of opportunity in the face of ambition; and if it be pursued and acted upon would concentrate the wealth of this country in a few hands, lock up all its energies in the vaults of a few gentlemen, and reduce the American people to a condition that will not be so proud and will not be so encouraging as that condition has been in the years that are past.

Now, I call the attention of Democrats who are about to vote upon this proposition to the last Democratic platform, which provides:

> We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

We have pledged ourselves to bring about "competitive conditions," and we have specified as one of the means of doing so the prohibition of interlocking directorates. We are about to be permitted to vote upon that kind of proposition. I do not know whether or not a Democratic platform is binding, but, so far as I am concerned, until it is repealed by another grand council of my party, it will be binding upon me. I shall support the amendment by my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Missouri to make a slight correction in his statement. Of course, I know the error was unintentional, but I said nothing about cooperation and coordination of corporations. As I recollect, I was speaking of the cooperation of capital.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from Michigan—and of course the RECORD will show—to be speaking of the necessity of permitting common directorates for corporations; and he spoke of the cooperative coordination, as I understood him, between those corporations. The RECORD will show, and if I am mistaken I now apologize.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The RECORD will also show that about 20 years ago the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] filed a caveat to that expression, and it belongs to him. I turn it back to him.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, let us not forget, in discussing this matter—and I hope the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will not forget it—that the proposition is to substitute one way of dealing with the question of interlocking directorates for another way. It is not right to assume that, because we shall vote against the amendment, we are opposed to the regulation of interlocking directorates—quite the contrary is the fact. I think it is easy to show that the House provision, which was concurred in by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, is much the more effective way of dealing with this subject, and it is certainly the only way, in my judgment, that we can reach it within the powers of this body.

Let us not forget another thing. We talk about regulating directors. What are directors? They are just what the laws of the State which creates the corporation and the stockholders of the corporation choose to make them. We stand here and talk about directors as if a director were a man whose duties and whose obligations were all fixed by law, when, as a matter of fact, practically any corporation in the United States can, under the laws of the States, fix exactly what a director may do and what he may not do. The trouble I have in approaching this subject is the deeper one, that if you cut the wings of directors you may force many corporations to govern themselves by themselves and entirely eliminate directors, or so curb their powers as to make them useless.

Mr. President, the stockholders, and not the directors, own a corporation. The stockholders say what the directors may do and what they may not do. It is within the power, I would say, under the laws of the different States, of at least four-fifths of the corporations of the United States to govern themselves entirely without a board of directors—that is, for all practical purposes. Under the laws of several of the States whose laws I have examined, the powers of the directors are fixed, not by law but by the by-laws of the corporation—that is, the by-laws of the stockholders—and if we go to an unreasonable extent we may force a condition under which the stockholders instead of the directors will have to run the corporation.

In other words, after all has been said, we must admit that we are dealing with the form and not entirely with the substance. That is a condition that we ought to think about.

The next proposition is, to my mind, fundamental in considering this question. We can deal only with interstate commerce. The provision agreed to by the House and reported by the Judiciary Committee to the Senate goes to the full extent, in our judgment, to which we can go or ought to go in dealing with this particular phase or branch of the trust-regulation question. Why do we say that? We realize that interstate commerce, in so far as it is controlled by corporations, is in the hands of State corporations. Take the instance submitted by the Senator from Montana, the case of a corporation in Wyoming desiring to go over into Montana and being unable to do so because the laws of Montana provide that you can not do that business by a foreign corporation in that State. That is not an extreme case. The laws of Pennsylvania provide that no company may mine coal in that State unless it be a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania. A West Virginia corporation can not mine coal nor carry on the coal-mining business in the State of Pennsylvania at all, but such business must be conducted by a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania. I speak of the coal business and the oil business because I happen to be more familiar with those industries; but anyone can see that the same principle would apply to any other industry under the same conditions and circumstances.

Now, what is the situation? Take a man in the coal business. When he develops that business to the point where he has a market and where he can sell his coal, he has his organization. The next thing that he wants to do is to get all the coal for his market which the market demands. His market may demand Pittsburgh coal; it may demand New River, Kanawha, Thacker, or Pocahontas coal; it may demand the great Black Warrior coal, which I mention out of deference to my friend from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. No matter what coal may be demanded by the market, the wide-awake, enterprising coal merchant will want to get the coal.

Suppose he is conducting a coal business in the State of Maryland and operating in the great Georges Creek field, and finds after he has built up a market that some of his customers want Pennsylvania coal, and he wants to mine that kind of coal. His Maryland corporation can not do so in the State of Pennsylvania. He organizes a corporation in the State of Pennsylvania, and he produces sufficient coal in the State of Pennsylvania to supply his market. That is the way in which the coal business grows and develops, and we should keep that in mind when dealing with all these matters.

That which experience teaches is necessary to legitimate success and which enables the enterprising man to expand his business should not be made unlawful per se, but only when it is made or becomes the handmaiden of monopoly or the restraint of trade.

Mr. President, I am not worried about the efforts to find big business. I have stated my position here on the greater question. Everybody in this country knows where the trust is; everybody knows who is running the trusts; everybody knows how the trust was developed; every man of sufficient intelligence to occupy a seat in this body knows in his heart that he can go and lay his hands on the trust, the home of the trust, the organizer of the trusts, and the backer of the great trusts which we are trying to reach; but when you enact a law that will wipe them out, you will also wipe out the thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of little men who are struggling along trying to cope with the big organizations, trying to build up business in the various States. It is time to consider carefully and balance results. My illustration is true of coal; it is true of oil; it is true of lumber; it is true of limestone, of the sheep business, the orchard business, the cotton business, and everything else which constitute the industrial activities of the people.

Mr. President, I want to conform to the principles enunciated in the Democratic platform. I am committed to do that, and I will go just as far as I can under the Constitution to meet the obligation which we made to the people, but in reporting this bill here, we have gone as far as I think we can safely go under the powers granted to us by the Constitution, and as far as I think it is safe to go, from what I know of my own experience to be the actual condition of the little man struggling to do business in this country. That man I will not intentionally hurt if I can help it. He is not a trust, and not the beginning of a trust; he is the struggling business man, the man who has created business in this country. That man I will protect if I can; for that man I appeal.

There is a wide field within our powers and clearly in harmony with our platform promises, for curbing the known combinations of wealth which are stifling competition. Let us not experiment with the small business man.

Mr. President, that man will be hurt; he will be stricken if the Senate shall turn down the provision of the House bill and adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Therefore I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this question, but I desire to state the reasons which will explain my vote. I believe the incorporation of this amendment would be very unfortunate. While not so designed, its effect must be, in my judgment, to extend the influence and the power of the great corporations of the country at the expense of the thousands and tens of thousands of men engaged in small enterprises.

The mistake which I think is made in recommending this amendment consists in this: We know the abuse which we are trying to correct; we have already supplied several remedies; there is no advantage in multiplying remedies for an acknowledged abuse. In the recent banking and currency law we enacted provisions which were designed to afford relief. In the judgment of many, the Sherman Act, as a result of 20 years of construction and interpretation, is to-day a sufficient remedy for all these abuses. Yet we have gone beyond that in this bill; we have supplemented the Sherman Antitrust Act; we have taken every reasonable step that is necessary to destroy monopoly; and, having done all that, a suggestion is now made which is wholly unnecessary and which can offer but a modicum of benefit while inflicting injury and imposing needless restraints upon American enterprise. It is for this reason that I shall vote against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, on which he asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am going to use the time, or some of it, which I have on the bill, and if I need any more I will use some of the time I have on the amendment.

We have been kept here all summer and into the fall, long after we should have been home, in order to do certain things. We are going to do something, but we are not going to do what was laid out for us to do. I concede that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has made a gallant fight; but, with all his allies, he has not been able to make a single dent in the intrenchments of the committee. We have paid but very little respect to the Democratic platform and have had very little regard for it during the session; neither have we paid very much attention to the recommendations of the President with reference to the legislation known as the trust legislation.

On January 20 last the President addressed a joint session of the Congress on the subject of trusts and monopolies, suggesting and recommending certain legislation. While recognizing the difficulties in dealing with this matter, he was most optimistic as to an easy and speedy solution. He thought that "a clear and all but unanimous agreement in anticipation of our action" had already come about, although what "our action" would be no one really knew. To him "it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter," and in a burst of optimism, unabated by past experience in legislative celerity, closed his address in this splendid fashion:

We are now about to write the additional articles of our constitution of peace—the peace that is honor and freedom and prosperity.

This is beautiful, soothing, inspiring. Not one of those articles to be so soon and so easily written has, however, been written. That which was so clear and easy in the chamber of theoretical composition has become more doubtful and difficult to work out in the legislative forum.

The proposition which the President placed first in importance was the prevention of interlockings of the personnel of the directorates of great corporations—banks and railroads, industrial, commercial, and public-service bodies. This has been very imperfectly, uncertainly, and inadequately provided for in the pending bill.

As second in importance he considered the conferring upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to superintend and regulate the financial operations of the railroads and the issuance of stocks, bonds, securities, and so forth. This has not been done, and it is now currently and confidently asserted that under the pressure of the railroads and upon the plea of war necessities this legislation will be put over until the next session and this article of the constitution of peace will remain unwritten in any form.

The President said that uncertainty hampers business, that nothing daunts and discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of failing under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure what the law is, and he urged that we should forbid, by statute, item by item, in such terms as will eliminate uncertainty in the law and its penalty, those practices, processes, and methods of monopoly and restraints of trade which experience has disclosed to be hurtful. These were wise words, wise suggestions. They have not been followed. On the contrary, existing laws have been rendered more ambiguous, and laws more uncertain in meaning and operation are proposed and their passage imminent. The business world is confronted with the creation of a legislative-administrative-judicial body to pass upon the validity of their acts, such validity to be determined at its own sweet will. We have passed through this body an act providing for a Federal trade commission, and it is now in conference. We have given it power to declare without limitation what trade practices are lawful and what are unlawful. What can be more uncertain than this? If it is agreed to and becomes the law, business will be hampered, business will be daunted, and business will be discouraged as never before, and the wise words of the President will be brought to naught, and this Constitution of peace and freedom will be a Constitution of turmoil, litigation, prosecutions, and bondage. If the President believes now as he believed when he wrote that message, he will advise the conferees to take from the commission this unlimited and indefinite power. A word from him will do it. I voted for the trade commission bill, as a whole, with much misgiving and largely that it might go to conference, in the hope that something good might come out of it. I am more and more convinced that it would be most unwise to enact it into law in its present form. Not only will it bring forth a veritable army of Government agents, sleuths, inspectors, and inquisitors, entailing upon the people millions of expense, but it will multiply manyfold the uncertainties that hamper and daunt business. The only business that will be encouraged and increased will be that of the lawyer. He will be in great demand, and the people and the courts will suffer. This is surely not what the President had in mind, this is not what the people had a right to expect. This is not the kind of commission the President said "the opinion of the country would instantly approve of"; this is not the kind of commission the "business men desire." He suggested a commission that would aid in carrying out the courts' decrees, not make decrees—a commission that would be an instrument of information and publicity, a clearing house for facts, not a lawmaking, law-enforcing judicial body, as this commission is.

The President also suggested that combinations in the industrial world injure not only the public, but individuals also, and that if the Government secures judgment against such combinations, individuals claiming to be injured should be able to found their suits for redress upon the facts and judgments found and entered in suits brought by the Government. He considered this "another matter in which imperative considerations of justice and fair play suggest thoughtful remedial action." We have in the pending bill in a sort of half-hearted way attempted to meet this suggestion. We have written a very weak and imperfect article in the constitution of peace by providing that judgments in Government suits shall be only prima facie evidence of the facts, thus leaving to the individual a burden which but few can bear and which but few will undertake to bear. Most individuals will suffer the wrongs of combinations rather than assume the additional burdens of attempting to defend against them.

Mr. President, these "additional articles of our constitution of peace" are being poorly, imperfectly, ambiguously, and dangerously written. Why? Not only because they are most difficult to write, but because we began to write them when we should have been going home; because the time that should have been given to their writing was taken up in the uncalled-for and unjustifiable repeal of the Panama exemption provision, in the interest of and at the behest of the transcontinental railroad lines, and to secure the good will of foreign powers, who had no cause of complaint against us; because we have written them grudgingly, grumblingly, and unwillingly, like truant schoolboys held to a task after school hours; because we began to write them when we were weary, worn, and fagged physically and mentally by continuous service, with long hours, for more than 14 months; because we have written them under the pressure of sessions of the Senate from 11 in the morning until 6 in the evening, with a multitude of other duties to perform in the meantime, because we have had no time for study and preparation, without neglecting our other duties or the sessions of the Senate; and because only a small proportion of the Senators have been present and assisted in the writing and consideration of these measures.

The consideration of these bills, in view of their importance and the vast and varied interests which they affect, has been a farce, almost a crime. When the Panama repeal was consummated we should have passed the appropriation bills and gone home or else stayed here and done our work. We did neither. Congress remained in session; Senators went away. Appropriation bills that should have been passed before July were not passed until August, and the whole business of the Government was disorganized and disarranged. Committees could not get quorums. Reports were delayed. Delays were had in the hope that the Executive would let us get away without passing these measures. When these hopes were blasted the few that were here tried to get to work. Revolutionary and wholly unjustifiable methods were pursued, not to perfect the bills, but to hasten a vote upon them. While the Constitution declares that less than a quorum can not do business, that provision has been avoided by holding that the most important function of the Senate is not business. The only way to arrive at a right conclusion regarding these or any other measures is through discussion, debate, and an interchange of views, and especially through information given by those who are especially familiar with the subjects involved by special thought, study, and investigation. In order, however, that we might after a fashion proceed and reach a vote without the presence of a constitutional Senate, it has been held, at the instance of the majority, that debate, legitimate, bona fide discussion, is not business, and therefore a quorum could not be required except when a vote was to be taken, unless in the meantime a petition had been presented or a leave of absence asked or something of that kind. According to modern ideas the Senate was not transacting business when Webster was delivering his immortal reply to Hayne, but the presentation of a petition from Podunk asking for the improvement of Whistler Creek is not only an act of statesmanship but a great business transaction that will justify the calling of the roll to see if a quorum is present to witness the performance of such a profound event. There has been no justification for following such an untenable and revolutionary course. No filibuster against any of these bills has been attempted or intended. No illegitimate debate has been indulged in. No partisanship has been injected into their consideration by the minority. They are not partisan measures and should not be made such. They should have the best thought, the benefit of the best experience, and the best suggestions of the ablest and most experienced Members of this body. The discussion by such Senators and such an interchange of views is the most important business that can engage the attention of the Senate. The recording of the vote after that interchange of views is business of the least importance, and is often done without the casting of a single vote.

Mr. President, what the people who have looked down upon us from the galleries of the Senate during the last few weeks must have thought of our deliberations I shall not pretend to say. I am afraid they have not taken to the folks at home a very good report. How could they? They know pretty well the situation. The folks at home do not. They may have read in the RECORD from time to time the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri that during the discussion most of the seats are empty, or they may have read the pertinent statements of the Senator from New Hampshire with reference to the difficulties in securing a quorum from time to time, and yet this does not give a correct idea of the situation. I feel it proper to place in the RECORD some facts that will show the actual conditions under which this trust legislation has been considered and let the people judge whether such conditions are likely to bring forth those articles of the constitution of peace that are likely to be beneficial to the people and the country.

When it was held that discussion was not business, and that a quorum could not be called for when nothing but discussion had intervened, it occurred to me that it might be interesting to note from time to time the number of Senators on the floor. A roll call does not show the actual situation. A Senator comes in and answers to his name and goes out, so that, although the call may show 49 Senators present, as a matter of fact there may be but few actually giving attention to the matter in hand. I have noted the Senators on the floor every half hour, as nearly as I could with the interruptions that have occurred. The attendance shown is typical of the attendance during the consideration of these measures.

Of course, as everybody knows, we have a membership of 96, and 49 constitute a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry, but I have so little time that it will be impossible for me to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator refuses to be interrupted.

Mr. JONES. On Tuesday, about five weeks ago, at 3 o'clock there were 18 Senators present; at 3.30, 20; at 4 o'clock, 19; at 4.30, 30; at 5 o'clock, 26; at 5.30, 28.

On Wednesday, when we met at 11 o'clock, no doubt a quorum was called, as has been the custom. At 12 o'clock there were 36 Senators present; at 12.30 there were 29; at 1.30, 16; at 2 o'clock, 22; at 2.30, 19; at 3 o'clock, 29; at 3.30, 26; at 4 o'clock, 33; at 4.30, 27; at 5 o'clock, 25.

On Thursday of the same week at 12 o'clock there were 26 Senators present; at 12.30, 27; at 1 o'clock, 24; at 2 o'clock, 15; at 2.30, 23; at 3 o'clock, 39; at 3.30, 31; at 4 o'clock, 32; at 4.30, 32; at 5.30, 31.

On Friday of the same week at 1.30 o'clock there were 21 Senators present; at 2 o'clock, 26; at 2.30, 21; at 3.10, 31; at 3.40, 22; at 4.10, 29; at 4.55, 28.

On Saturday at 12.35 there were 28 Senators present; at 1 o'clock, 40; at 1.30, 28; at 2.30, 20; at 3 o'clock, 32; at 3.30, 26; at 4 o'clock, 32; at 4.30, 32; at 5.05, 24; at 5.30, 28.

On Tuesday following at 12.30 there were 21 Senators present; at 1 o'clock, 18; at 1.30, 16; at 2.45, 18; at 3.30, 22; at 3.45, 20; at 4 o'clock, 22; at 4.30, 28; at 5 o'clock, 29; at 5.40, 28.

On Tuesday, August 18, after the Senate had revoked the rule under which committees might meet while the Senate was in session, at 12.30 there were 25 Senators present; at 1.10, 20; at 2 o'clock, 18; at 2.30, 21; at 3.30, 19; at 4 o'clock, 27; at 4.30, 32; at 5 o'clock, 33.

On Friday, August 21, at 2.15 there were 18 Senators present; at 2.30, 19. At 4 o'clock a quorum was called, and at 4.05 a quorum was completed; that is, 49 Senators had answered to their names. At 4.07, or 2 minutes afterwards, 22 Senators were present on the floor; at 4.30, 20; at 5.05, 23; at 5.30, 29.

On Monday, August 24, a quorum was secured at 11.45 o'clock. At 12.15, 36 Senators were present. Another roll call occurred in the meantime. At 12.45 there were 19 Senators present; at 1 o'clock, 16; at 1.15, 16.

Mr. President, I have here some other data of the same character, but I shall not take the time of the Senate to give it. It shows the same condition.

On August 25 we had a criticism made on the floor of the Senate with reference to the lack of attendance here. At 1 o'clock we had 14 Senators present; at 1.27 we had a roll call completed and 50 Senators answered; at 1.30, or three minutes afterwards, there were 19 Senators on the floor; at 2 o'clock there were 9 Senators on the floor; at 2.30 we had a roll call and 49 Senators answered to their names; at 2.32, or two minutes afterward, there were 23 Senators on the floor; at 3.30, 19; at 4 o'clock, 20; and at 4.30, 18.

Mr. President, this simply shows the conditions under which we have been framing this legislation. It simply shows the conditions under which the most important legislation Congress has had under consideration for many, many years has been considered in this body. I do not blame Senators, in a sense, for being away. Congress has been in continuous session from the 15th of April, 1913, and when we began to consider this legislation, as I have said, Members were worn out. Many of them were probably almost forced to go away. It was not right and not fair and not just, as has been suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that Senators should be kept here, should be forced to stay here under such conditions, to consider these measures, as we have been forced to do.

Mr. President, if I vote for this measure it will not be because I approve of it or am in favor of its passage as a whole, but simply that it may be sent to conference, in the hope that from the conference will come a measure of some merit. There are some few things in this bill that I favor that do not furnish any great affirmative relief, but they will have a good effect and should be passed. The provisions in this bill contained in section 7 and from section 15 on, in my judgment, are merely legislative declarations of existing law and the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am glad to have them enacted into law so as to insure fair treatment to labor by all judges in these matters, but while we treat labor fairly and justly so should we treat business, capital, and industry equitably and justly.

Most of the provisions of this measure——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia will state his point of order.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to know how long the Senator from Washington has been speaking. We are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement, and in justice to other Senators I do not think the rule should be extended in the case of one Senator and not in that of others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington gave notice that he was going to consume his entire time, that having 15 minutes on the bill itself and 15 minutes on this amendment he would occupy the entire time upon it.

Mr. JONES. I would have been through by this time. I have only a few more words to say.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not want to take the Senator off his feet, but, Mr. President, we are acting under a unanimous-consent agreement and——

Mr. JONES. I do not think the Senator could do that under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes, I could. The Senator has not any right to speak for more than 15 minutes.

Mr. JONES. I am going to conclude very soon.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator has not any right to "bunch his hits" in that way.

Mr. JONES. Most of the provisions of this measure, as they relate to business and industry, as well as those of the trade commission bill, are uncertain, indefinite, and ambiguous in terms and possible effect. We do not know what they mean. They will hamper business, becloud its pathway, encourage litigation, stifle enterprise, multiply Government officials, and augment expenses. The suggestions of the President were wise. We would have done well to follow them. We have not done so. These bills do not conform to his recommendations. Instead of writing the articles of a constitution of peace we are writing the articles of a constitution of litigation, irritation, stagnation, and adversity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], on which he has requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I will withhold my vote, but I desire to be counted as "present."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and transfer it to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following as a new section to the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. No corporation shall engage or continue in commerce if the amount of capital employed is so great as to destroy or prevent substantially competitive conditions in the general field of industry to which the business carried on belongs.

The Federal trade commission shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to determine whether any corporation is violating the law in employing such an amount of capital that the mere extent of capital destroys or prevents substantially competitive conditions, and it shall prescribe rules for the inquiry or examination authorized in this section, which shall include notice and hearing. In making such inquiry and in reaching a conclusion thereunder the commission shall be guided and controlled by the rules established in the law. When any such inquiry is completed the commission shall determine whether there has been or is a violation of the law in the respect, and in the respect only, hereinbefore set forth, and it shall enter its determination in a record kept for that purpose.

If the determination is that there has been or is a violation as aforesaid, then, unless the violation ceases within a period to be fixed by the commission, the commission may either submit all its information, with its determination thereon, to the Department of Justice for such action as that department may lawfully take, or it may institute in the name of the United States such suit or suits in equity as are now authorized by the United States in the said act of 1890, or which are authorized by this act to be brought in the name of the United States; and in any suit or suits so instituted by the commission in the name of the United States the jurisdiction of the courts and the rights and remedies shall be the same as though the suit or suits had been instituted in the name of the United States by or under the direction of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] which prohibited any corporation from employing more than $100,000,000 in its business. I voted against it not because I am of the opinion that mere bigness may not be an offense or ought not to be an offense, but because an arbitrary allotment of capital covering the whole field of commerce and industry must necessarily be, as I thought, ineffective.

I believe that the corporations in this country ought to be limited in the amount of capital that they can respectively employ. I believe that there must be an inquiry before judgment is rendered with regard to the amount of capital that can thus be employed without suppressing or impairing competition. In one kind of business there might be a very large capital employed and competition still exist. For instance, take the steel business. In round numbers there are, I think, about $3,000,000,000 of capital employed in that business. One company in the business uses about one-half of the capital, and the competition between that company and the smaller corporations is not equal competition. It would be better for this country, a great deal better, if we had 10 corporations each employing $300,000,000, so that they could battle for the business upon somewhat even terms than to have one corporation with a billion and a half and the other billion and a half divided among a hundred or more corporations.

Therefore I would have the trade commission examine in each instance the amount of capital which can be used, so that the capital in and of itself will not destroy or prevent substantially competitive conditions. I have no doubt that in the end we will reach that method of regulation. I know of various kinds of business in which no one corporation should be permitted to employ more than $100,000, and so on over the whole field.

I do not intend to enlarge upon this. I simply predict that in the end if we preserve that equality which is necessary in order to retain and maintain competition in the United States some function of the Government will be employed to limit the capital that may be used in a particular business.

I have offered the amendment, Mr. President, not with the least hope that it will be adopted. It is perfectly manifest that amendments which alter the bill substantially will not be approved by a majority of the Senate. I offered it because it is a part of a bill that I have had pending before the Senate for more than a year and a half, and it embodies my views with respect to the regulation which should obtain in this respect.

I do not intend to ask for a roll call upon it unless a viva voce vote discloses that it has some friends in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if this amendment was presented to the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was not.

Mr. WALSH. I did not recall its consideration there.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not sure that the Senator was there in the early meetings of the committee; but, if he was, he will remember that I disclosed to the committee my opinions with regard to the subject. However, I did not offer the amendment in the committee.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the Senator, also, whether the amendment has been printed heretofore.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has been printed for a year and a half.

Mr. WALSH. Not as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; as an independent bill. The only change that I have made in it is that I have now given the Federal trade commission the name which the bill recently passed gave it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Iowa if this amendment was presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee with reference to the trade commission bill when that bill was under consideration?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator object to stating what action was taken by the committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. There never was any action upon it. I presented it along with my other amendments with regard to interlocking directorates and holding companies. There never was a vote upon it in the Interstate Commerce Committee, but the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] will, I am sure, remember that I have frequently discussed it before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are two or three amendments, Mr. President, that I will not discuss, contenting myself by offering them. In section 7, page 7, line 12, I move to strike out "agricultural, or horticultural" and insert the words "or other," so that the bill will provide for "labor or other organizations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help."

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 12, strike out the words "agricultural, or horticultural" and insert the words "or other," so that if amended it will read:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor or other organizations—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not ask for a recorded vote. On the same page—page 7—in line 16, the word "lawfully" occurs. The text reads:

Or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

The word "lawfully" is a committee amendment which was agreed to; but in line 19 that word is omitted, so that at present it reads:

Such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations—

And so forth. I move to amend by inserting at the beginning of line 19 "when lawfully conducted," so that it shall read:

Nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, when lawfully conducted, be held or construed—

And so forth, making it harmonize with the other part of the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Turning to page 27 of the bill, section 18, in line 15, I find the words "and lawful," the text reading—or from withholding their patronage from any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful—

And the committee inserted "and lawful"— means so to do.

On lines 5, 6, and 7 I find this language—or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

I move to insert, after the word "peaceful," the words "and lawful," so as to make it harmonize with the words the committee inserted in line 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move further to amend, in an effort to harmonize the bill with the amendment that the committee inserted—I suggest that I am not having very good success, but nevertheless I shall make one more effort. In line 11 the words are:

or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working.

As I have suggested, in line 15 the words "and lawful" are inserted. I move to insert, after the word "peacefully," in line 11, the words "and lawfully," so as to make it conform substantially to the amendment which the committee reported and which has been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it surprises me more than I can express that the Senate should deliberately insert the word "lawful" in one line of the bill relating to one particular act, and that as to other matters that are directly connected with it, and have the same bearing upon the legislation, the Senate should refuse to insert the words in those lines to which I have called attention; but evidently that is the decision that has been reached, and it is useless for me to waste a moment of time in arguing that it ought to be otherwise. I submit as gracefully as I know how to the vote which has been taken, with the feeling that when this bill has been enacted into law, as I suppose it will be, in the particulars to which I have called the attention of the Senate it will be a very imperfect and very unjust measure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8 it is proposed to insert as a new paragraph the following:

From and after September 1, 1915, no common carrier engaged in commerce shall own, hold, or acquire the whole or any part of the shares of capital stock of another corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing, mining, producing, or dealing in any article or commodity of commerce.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to overcome the miscarriage of the Hepburn Act of 1906 as to the production and ownership by common carriers of the commodities of transportation.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington if the amendment he has just submitted covers lumber? I did not distinctly hear it read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It makes no exception of lumber.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the amendment is printed? I do not find it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has not yet been printed. It is in typewriting.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I will ask that it be again stated, because I expected I should find it in the printed compilation of amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. POINDEXTER.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the subject matter covered by this amendment has been so thoroughly discussed and has been before the public to such an extent that it should be unnecessary to discuss it further.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to ask the Senator from Washington, Is not the amendment which he proposes in substance the commodities clause of the Hepburn law? Is not that the law now?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; that is not the law now.

Mr. CHILTON. Has the Senator examined it, so that he may speak accurately?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is a commodity clause in the law to which the Senator from West Virginia refers. This amendment would be in effect an amendment to that clause which has come to be called the commodity clause of the Hepburn Act, which was designed to accomplish exactly what this amendment will accomplish. Undoubtedly it was intended by the Hepburn Act to accomplish what it stated in plain terms, that a common carrier should not transport commodities which it owned or which it had mined or produced or manufactured, the purpose being to prevent the oppression which a common carrier had in its power, by controlling the necessary transportation for a commodity, to visit upon all of its competitors. That has not only been one of the chief agencies of monopoly, but it has been one of the most repulsive forms of oppression of independent miners, producers, manufacturers, and merchants in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Washington a question. Does he not think it would be better if he would insert after the words "article or commodity of commerce" the words "to be carried by it"? I understand what he is striking at. Here is a railroad that owns a controlling interest in a coal mine right along its line, and it carries the coal; here is another railroad that owns a controlling interest in a sawmill, and it carries the lumber; but certainly the Senator will have no objection to a railroad in Pennsylvania owning stock in a lumber mill in the State of Washington or owning stock in an independent mine down in Alabama. If he wants to strike at the evil, it seems to me he ought to limit his amendment so as to strike at it and at nothing else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is deserving of attention; but if the Senator will consider carefully the proposition, I think he will agree with me, in the first place, that it is not necessary to make such an exception as that. There is no need on the part of railroad companies in Pennsylvania to own coal mines in Alabama; there is not any possible injury which will result to the common carriers in depriving them of any such power as that. On the other hand, unless the rule is made absolute, the difficulty of enforcing it will be so great as to render it almost nugatory. It would be very difficult to determine whether or not the product of a particular coal mine or a particular manufacturing concern of any kind would be transported at one time or another by a particular railroad. In the very instance which the Senator from Mississippi cites, knowing as we do the interrelation of all of the great railroads of the country, if the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. in the State of Pennsylvania is interested in a coal mine in the State of Alabama, it is obvious to everybody that while the Pennsylvania Railroad may not have a railroad line in Alabama it would have such influence with the railroad lines in Alabama that it could get favors and preferences and privileges, which would destroy its competitors if it were really engaged there in the business of mining coal.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield first to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE], and then I shall yield to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator from Washington that the ownership by a railroad company in Pennsylvania of coal mines in Alabama might lead to the nondevelopment or want of operation of the Alabama mines, in order that the railroad company in Pennsylvania might use its own road to haul Pennsylvania coal, and thereby shut out its competitor in Alabama.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That might very well be one of the evils of allowing a railroad to engage in mining and manufacturing or some business not connected with the business of a common carrier; in fact, there was very recently before the subcommittee of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a case of the kind which is now spoken of by the Senator from Alabama, in which it was charged that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., with its affiliated systems, such as the Norfolk & Western, and with its control over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., was actually retarding and suppressing the development of coal mines in the southern Appalachian region, whose product would have gone to tidewater over the Southern Railroad. There was an actual case which bears out the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama.

Now, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the purpose which the Senator has in view. It is one that has been discussed in Congress heretofore, and therefore is fairly well understood; but, if I understand the amendment correctly, it proposes that the existing holdings of such properties as the amendment seeks to prohibit must be disposed of by September 1 of next year. I am in doubt as to whether that disposal could be accomplished in so short a time. If this law is to be enforced as it ought to be enforced, it seems to me that it would require at least two years to dispose of the property without material loss. Has the Senator investigated that question so that he is confident that a year would be sufficient to accomplish the purpose he has in mind?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have based the amendment upon the provision of the original Hepburn Act passed in 1906, which allowed the railroads until May 1, 1908, to dispose of their holdings. I presume that that matter was considered at that time. I have not made any analysis of the present situation, but I do not regard it as essential to this proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My memory of that law is that there was some difficulty in enforcing it, because of the very objection which I am now mentioning. It was urged in the cases brought that it was impossible to comply with the provisions of the law without material loss.

I think there ought to be sufficient time in connection with a change of policy of this kind, so that the provision could be put into force without disturbing business very greatly, and I am sure that if the time limit could be extended until September 1, 1916, we could secure possibly some results that we might not secure if the time is limited to one year.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, and I therefore ask leave to modify the amendment by striking out "1915" and inserting "1916."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have before me the commodities clause of the Hepburn Act, which is as follows:

From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity, other than timber and the manufactured products thereof, manufactured, mined, or produced by it, or under its authority, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

In effect, is not the situation which the Senator from Washington seeks to cover already covered by the Hepburn law? The amendment of the Senator provides that the railroad companies shall not "own," while the commodities clause says they shall not "transport."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly; it is simply——

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that the matter is fully covered by the commodities clause. If the railroads can not transport an article, there is no reason for them owning it; and if they do own it, they will gradually rid themselves of its ownership. The commodities clause of the existing law provides that the railroads shall not transport any commodity "in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that would be very true; there would be no occasion for this amendment if the Hepburn Act had been construed by the courts to cover the ownership of stock in subsidiary corporations, which, in turn, control the commodity. The Supreme Court in 1908 held that the ownership by a common carrier of the stock in a manufacturing, mining, or producing company which produced the article transported by the common carrier was not a violation of the act, and the amendment I have offered is designed for the purpose of meeting the situation created by that decision. The law still stands as decided in that case, although the Supreme Court has in subsequent decisions to some extent modified the position which it took in that case, and has apparently come back in some degree to the evident intent of Congress when it passed the Hepburn Act. It has held in subsequent cases that if the common carrier dominated the producing corporation and so controlled it that the producing corporation had no will of its own, that would be a violation of the Hepburn Act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The commodities clause just read by the Senator from North Carolina allows the railroad companies to own coal mines, we will say, and to transport for their own use the coal produced by those mines. As I understand the Senator's amendment, however, it goes further than that and provides that a railroad company shall not even own a coal mine for the purpose of mining coal for use on its own line—in other words, every railroad which may own a coal mine or timberland must purchase from others coal or timber for its own particular use. Am I correct in my understanding of the meaning of the amendment of the Senator and was that his intention?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was not my intention, and I do not think it has that effect, although I would not regard that as a great defect in it if it did have that effect. The amendment refers to mining, manufacturing, and producing companies; it would not in any way prohibit a railroad company from owning coal mines to supply itself with coal. It does not relate to the direct ownership of the property in the first place; it only deals with the ownership of stock in a subordinate corporation.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, my impression differs from that of the Senator from Washington, and I suggest that the amendment be again stated, because I rather think that as offered it would prevent a railroad company from owning a coal mine on the line of its own road and using the coal for its own use. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment again.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new paragraph in section 8 to read:

That from and after September 1, 1916, no common carrier engaged in commerce shall own, hold, or acquire the whole or any part of the shares of capital stock of another corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing, mining, producing, or dealing in any article or commodity of commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment would virtually prevent a railroad company from owning a coal mine and producing coal from that mine for its own use or transporting the coal over its own lines for that purpose. I hardly think the Senator intends to go that far. I know, so far as my own State is concerned, that the railroads there which own coal mines and mine the coal for their own particular use would be compelled, if the amendment were adopted, to go hundreds of miles to purchase from other companies coal in order to operate their own lines.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is the Senator directing his objection to the ownership by the railroads of the stock of another corporation? That is the only thing that this amendment deals with.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I only speak so far as my own State is concerned. A number of railroads have been organized in the State of Utah, and their incorporation papers have authorized them to build, operate, and maintain a railroad, but under the original act of incorporation they are not themselves allowed to mine coal; so that the only way by which they can mine it is through subsidiary companies, and of course they control, in fact they own virtually, all of the stock of the subsidiary coal companies.

Under the Senator's amendment that would be absolutely impossible; or, in other words, they would have to sell the coal interests by the 1st of June, 1915 or 1916, as the case may be. That would work a hardship, not upon the great lines, perhaps, but upon a line that was in one State or had some business in one State and owned its coal, perhaps, over the line in another State. I am fearful that it would work a great hardship on many of the smaller corporations of this country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in order to meet the Senator's objection—it is not an objection in my mind, however, because I believe the evils of the corporate ownership of subordinate corporations far more than overbalance any benefits that may accrue from it—I will ask to incorporate in the amendment the very words of the Hepburn Act. I propose, at the close of the amendment, to add these words:

Except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for the use of such common carrier in the conduct of its business.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be perfectly satisfactory to me if that amendment were there; but I believe if it is so amended it is virtually the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that the language offered by him is quite incongruous with that which precedes it. What the Senator wants I have endeavored to express in the following amendment. The Senator's amendment provides that no common carrier or corporation shall hold stock in any other corporation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not exactly that; but what is the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that there be added—

other than corporations engaged exclusively in the production of commodities necessary and intended for the use of such common carrier in the conduct of its business as such—

Using the language of the Hepburn act.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In section 8 it is proposed to insert:

From and after September 1, 1916, no common carrier engaged in commerce shall own, hold, or acquire the whole or any part of the shares of capital stock of another corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing, mining, producing, or dealing in any article or commodity of commerce, other than corporations engaged exclusively in the production of commodities necessary and intended for the use of such common carrier in the conduct of its business as such.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. GORE's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and to say that if present he would have voted "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before, and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I inquire whether the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as a matter of language, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] made some corrections a little while ago in section 10. In that same section I noticed at the time the concluding sentence in the first paragraph, which ought to be corrected, it seems to me. It reads:

No bid shall be received unless the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof,—

There can not be any officers, directors, and general managers of a bid. The section goes on to say—if it be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, etc.

I would suggest to the Senator that this language ought to be substituted for that sentence:

That no bid shall be received from a corporation, partnership, or firm unless the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers of the corporation or of the members of the partnership or firm submitting it be given with the bid.

Mr. CHILTON. This is the way it reads:

No bid shall be received unless the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof, if it be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, be given with the bid.

That is perfectly clear. I do not see anything wrong about that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It may be; but I do not understand how a bid could have officers or directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for section 7. It will be found in the collection of printed amendments on page 5. Before I do that I will state that I intend to take the time the rule allows me for the discussion of this amendment; but I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether he expects to continue in session this evening or later than the usual time?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator, but I am very anxious also to finish the bill. If there is a reasonable likelihood of finishing it to-night, we will go on.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have an order, have we not——

Mr. GALLINGER. Have we not an order to recess at 6 o'clock?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not think there is any order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the order on which we are meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. CULBERSON. My recollection is that there is no order, Mr. President.

Mr. LANE. I wish to say, if I may be allowed to do so, that I have an amendment which I wish to offer, and I should like to have a fair opportunity to present it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe the Senator from Texas would like to keep the Senate here until the bill is finished.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us take a recess.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will say to the Senator that we will take a recess at 6 o'clock until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I ask that my amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 7 it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 7. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce, and nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor organizations having for their objects bettering the conditions, lessening the hours, or advancing the compensation of labor, nor to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from carrying out said objects in a lawful way; nor shall said laws be construed to prevent or prohibit any person or persons, whether single or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment or from ceasing to work or from advising or persuading others in a peaceful, orderly way, and at a place where they may lawfully be, either to work or abstain from working, or from withholding their patronage from a party to any dispute growing out of the terms or conditions of employment or from advising or persuading other wageworkers in a peaceful and orderly way so to do, or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value, or from assembling in a peaceful and orderly way for a lawful purpose in any place where they may lawfully be, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute. Nothing contained in said antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of agricultural, horticultural, or commercial organizations instituted for mutual benefit without capital stock and not conducted for the pecuniary profit of either such organization or the members thereof, or to forbid or restrain such members from carrying out said objects in a lawful way.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 6357. An act to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance; and

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution to correct error in H. R. 12045.

RECESS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Tuesday, September 1, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 2, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 1, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that every age has its problems to solve, since in solving them the manly virtues are developed to a higher degree of perfection; and we bless Thee that men look at these problems and their solution from different angles, so that when they are solved they are apt to be solved right, for we realize that no question is ever settled until it is settled right. Help us, we beseech Thee, to think right, to do right, that we may solve the problems of our day in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the same point of order that I made yesterday and will make to-morrow and hereafter.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. BUTLER. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 328 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey rises to a question of personal privilege. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it has to do with an article that appeared in the Newark Star of yesterday. The Newark Star is owned, operated, and controlled by one James Smith, jr., at one time United States Senator from the State of New Jersey, and sometimes known as "Sugar Jim."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. The former United States Senator from New Jersey says that the gentleman from New Jersey——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman will have to state what his question of privilege rests on.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. It rests on the statement made that the gentleman from New Jersey—that I was absent five times out of six during my service here in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a question of privilege——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has a question of privilege, he does not have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BORLAND. I renew the request that the gentleman have leave to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me we ought to determine at some time whether every Member of the House who has been absent, who makes the request for unanimous consent, has a matter of personal privilege to rise and discuss the question for an hour——

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I do not ask for an hour.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Or have unanimous consent for half an hour to make excuses.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I am not going to make any excuses; the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the Republican Party in the House, knows that I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether or not the Speaker has ruled on the question whether this is a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman I think we all recognize the importance of a Member having the right to explain a charge against him, but I think it is an unfortunate day to bring it up, and if the gentleman can I would like to ask him to postpone it until to-morrow. To-day is unanimous-consent day.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Give me 15 minutes to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman asks for 15 minutes, I will not object.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the leading editorial of the Newark Star, which, as I stated before, is owned and edited and controlled by one James Smith, jr., former United States Senator from the State of New Jersey, sometimes known in our State and elsewhere throughout the United States as "Sugar Jim," and whose fame rests upon his characterization as a traitor by Grover Cleveland, has this to say of me:

[From the Newark Star, James Smith, jr.]

KINKEAD ESCAPED FROM CUSTODY.

Proudly marching at the head of a Moose organization in Jersey City on Saturday was Congressman EUGENE KINKEAD, escaped from the custody of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, after he had been apprehended for constant and persistent violation of his sworn obligations to his constituents. Kinkead could not miss the opportunity to make this local display of himself for the sake of the capital in his chase for a $10,000 office. Every voter in Hudson County now knows that Kinkead has absented himself from his duties in Congress an average of five days out of every six, and that he was compelled late last week to make a temporary appearance at Washington by the Sergeant at Arms, while Congress voted to cut out his salary of $21 a day for absences, and here he was on Saturday appearing in the public streets in Jersey City looking for Moose votes and defying all the decencies. Is it such men as this chronic and shameless defaulter in important public duties at a time when every Congressman should be at his post that the people reward with fat offices? How much more of KINKEAD can the people of Hudson County stand?

[Laughter and applause.]

Thus closes the editorial of the quondam Senator from New Jersey. Here is an editorial by another paper that takes a bang at me occasionally. "Always absent from his post," starteth the editorial of the Hudson Observer, ably edited by one Mathias C. Ely, at one time secretary to James Smith, jr., and now an important figure in the Democratic county opposed to the intelligent electorate of the Democracy of our county. "Always absent from his post." I am not going to read this, because I have not the time, but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, by inserting this and putting in this ex-Senator's record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing certain excerpts from newspapers——

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. And the record of one James Smith, jr., one-time Senator from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall object to printing the record of some one who can not answer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to that part of the request. Is there any objection to printing the editorials? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read his record.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I can not; it is a mile long.

ALWAYS ABSENT FROM HIS POST.

Every man elected by the people to sit in either House of Congress ought in these days of trouble to be in his place at Washington assisting the President of the United States to maintain peace and neutrality, to keep moving the wheels of commerce, and to devise ways and means to protect the people from the avarice of the speculators in food and other necessaries of life.

This duty should appeal peculiarly to Congressman KINKEAD, who belongs to the dominant party, is a Member from the President's own State, and is presumed to have the experience that results from a considerable length of service.

It is not at all creditable to the Democratic Party to have one of the men upon whom it has bestowed high honors absent five out of every six days of the session, leaving upon the shoulders of other men the hard and thoughtful work of a critical time.

Such conduct is all the more objectionable in view of the circumstances that surround his neglect. Mr. KINKEAD has a variety of money-making occupations, public and private, ranging all the way from the building of roads in the new Palisades Park on the Hudson to the proprietorship of a street car advertising agency. He has two political offices, a third "on ice," and now wants a fourth. Nearly everything he possesses was gained through the generosity of the party to which he belongs

He is now spending most of his time going about the county of Hudson trying to assemble the rag-tag and bobtails who constituted the old foes of the President, riding in the process roughshod over his friend Clossey and others who helped him in his political career.

He is in this matter as false to Wilson, who has been good to him, as he is to his constituents, whose interests he is betraying by his absence from his post in the House of Representatives.

Congressman KINKEAD is very much mistaken if he thinks his course will be approved at the primaries. The organizations have already condemned him and indorsed one of his rivals in Bayonne, West Hoboken, Hoboken, Kearny, and Secaucus, and they will pass adversely upon his candidacy in Jersey City, Union Hill, and nearly all of the smaller municipalities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the difference between the former United States Senator and the former Senator's secretary is this, that what I say about the secretary he will print, because he is a man; he is not a coward. The former United States Senator will not print any of it—I will not say he is a coward, because I like Smith personally. [Laughter.] And now, in order that my colleagues might know who this gentleman is who so venomously addresseth himself regarding one of your colleagues, I read from the Congressional Directory of the Fifty-third Congress and find that James Smith, jr., of Newark, was born in that city June 12, 1851, and I ask unanimous consent to insert his biography in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the biography of ex-Senator James Smith, of New Jersey, as printed in the Congressional Directory of the Fifty-third Congress. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I just want to call attention to this statement. You see all I got was from the party, according to Smith. He says:

He has been tendered nearly every office in the gift of his party in the State, but has always refused office; is a manufacturer of patent and enameled leather in Newark, and conducts the largest business of the kind in the country.

At one time Senator Bailey was down in Texas, and he was making a speech, I think, in Waco, Tex., I am not sure of the town. There was a youngster who was sent out by his father to get supper supplies. He left in the afternoon and when he finally returned, carrying the bundles in his arms, his father said, "What is the matter; why did you stay so long?" "Well," he said, "Dad, I was down at the corner of Main and Washington Streets, and I heard a man talk there; I got interested and stayed overtime." The father said, "Who was it?" He replied, "I do not know, Dad. I do not know his name; he was running for some job. I did not get his name, but he certainly did recommend hisself highly." [Laughter.] Let the former Senator tell it, and he is some statesman.

Mr. Smith has a record during his six years' service in another body, at the other end of the Capitol, and I went to the expense—and it cost me $42—to have it prepared. I find that instead of quoting my record he inadvertently quoted his own, because, lacking a few votes, he missed five out of every six roll calls during his service in Congress. I had Collier's Weekly prepare me a statement of my votes during my service here, and I find that, lacking a few votes, I have been present five times out of every six when the roll in this House has been called. [Applause.]

The former United States Senator says he is a Democrat. I want to say to my brothers in this House that if Mr. Smith is a Democrat I belong either to the Bull Moose or to the regular Republican wing, because I have no place in the Democracy of Smith. [Applause.] A statement is attributed to him that no young man of my race or of my creed could go ahead in politics unless he bowed his head to the Smith yoke. I want to say to you—the membership of this House—that I have been here with you nearly six years and that my head is still on my own shoulders, and I have not bowed to Smith's yoke; and as long as I remain in political life my head will never be bowed to him or to any other political boss—call him James Smith, jr., or H. Otto Witpenn. I remember that in 1896—I was 20 years old at the time—I was out on the street corners talking for Bryan and I saw the ship leave New York that carried Smith away, and I have here a statement which he made before he left—that he could not follow Nebraska's peerless son in his flights of oratory nor could he support the doctrine that he gave out as Democratic principles. I supported Bryan then, as I heartily indorse now his efforts to bring about universal peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. I will.

Mr. MANN. Smith and Woodrow Wilson were on the same side at that time, I believe? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. That is a fair question, and I am glad my friend brought it up. Woodrow Wilson, as the gentleman well knows, does not claim to be infallible. He is just as human as the gentleman or myself; but I want to say to my friend that before he leaves here he will say, as we Democrats throughout the Nation are now saying, that the man whose Democracy he questions is the greatest President that this country has ever known. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We had an election in our State for governor about 14 years ago. We nominated the former mayor of the city of Newark, James M. Seymour. The Republicans nominated Franklin Murphy, former chairman of the Republican national committee, and when Franklin Murphy was elected governor he said of James Smith, jr., "I owe more to this man than I do to any other man that lives. That is why I am giving him the places that rightfully belong to the Republicans. I have no apology to make for my allegiance to Mr. Smith, because Mr. Smith was loyal to me." And his fight, my colleagues, was made along the lines that The Menace is making in my county against me, only he reversed the order. Smith, like myself, is the member of the faith that The Menace is fighting. He said that Seymour was an A. P. A., and he asked Catholics for that reason to vote against him. I am sorry he fooled some people then, but they are wise to him now, and when he went through the country a few years ago saying to the Catholic hierarchy of the Nation that Woodrow Wilson was an A. P. A. they showed how much credence they placed in that maliciously false statement. And I am proud to say to-day that every member of that faith realizes that in Woodrow Wilson we have an honest, faithful, loyal, patriotic American, and that is all that any race or any creed can ever ask for. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, we had an election last fall. We elected a governor of New Jersey, and the former Democratic United States Senator was on the firing line for Edward Caspar Stokes, the Republican candidate, and the county that the former United States Senator proudly boasts he holds in the hollow of his hand, the good old county of Essex, got away from his moorings and cast its vote for the present governor of New Jersey, a man whose friendship I am proud to claim, a Democrat of the Wilson type, Hon. James Fairman Fielder. My friends, lest there be any doubt as to what I mean when I want to characterize Smith as a traitor to his party, as a man who has commercialized his race and his religion, and a man who has capitalized his questionable Democracy, I want to say that outside of politics I am a good friend of the genial former United States Senator, and I wish him well. [Laughter.] If I had the time, I might tell of his deal with former Mayor Witpenn to defeat the Wilson candidate for Congress in the eighth district.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that he may have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, there are two elements of the party in Newark. Both elements were united upon your candidacy; and I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, if the former United States Senator knew your brand of Democracy, the same as I do, he would have been opposed to your nomination. He does not like Democrats of your type or mine. Another branch of the party is led by James R. Nugent, a relative of former United States Senator Smith, and if it had not been for the malign and baneful influence of Smith Mr. Nugent to-day would be one of the foremost figures in the Democracy of the Nation, because while Smith is a traitor Nugent has always been loyal to his party. I do not think Nugent ever cut a ticket, and I do not think Smith ever voted a ticket without cutting it. That is the difference and distinction between the two men. Nugent does not like me; but I want to be square with him, notwithstanding the fact that there is some personal difference between the two of us. I am not fearful of the effect that this newspaper will have in my county. My friends should remember this, that former Senator Smith is in Essex County, that I have the honor to represent in part, with part of Hudson County. My home is in Hudson County, and this is the only county east of the Mississippi River and north of Mason and Dixon's line that has been consistently carried by the Democratic Party, and I hope to never live to see the day that it leaves that column. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The former United States Senator is reported to have made $1,000,000 by reason of his activities in the United States Senate when the sugar bill was up. I do not know whether this is true or not; but if it is true, let me say to him that the good God giveth and the good God taketh away; but his millions can never defeat a man whom the people trust. If the people are with a man the bosses are against him, and that accounts for Smith's and Witpenn's opposition to me. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have ever risen to a question of privilege in this House, and if I were a candidate for reelection to Congress I would not at this time take up the time of the House in discussing this gentleman. But lest my people at home should believe the lying, slanderous utterances of this one-time United States Senator, this great, good, and loyal Democrat, I want to put myself on record where they can see his record and compare it with mine; and I am going to tell you what the people of Hudson County will say after they read this. They are going to say, "If is too bad that Smith was not absent from the United States Senate the other sixth of his time, so that the people of the United States would not have imposed upon them the heavy burdens of sugar taxation, which he and some of his colleagues, knifing the party that honored him, knifing the party that tendered him, in his own language, the best gifts in the State of New Jersey, and brought down on his and their heads that characterization from Grover Cleveland that I thank God will never be brought down on my head by any Democratic or Republican President of the United States.

I do not want my friends to think I am anything other than disappointed in this matter. I have not a bit of venom in my heart, I have not a bit of ill feeling against the former United States Senator. I hope that everything will go along well with him in the leather trade and that everything will go along well with him in the banking business. But I hope that every time he raises his poll in politics there will be enough Wilson Democrats in the State of New Jersey to give it the same bang that it gave his handsome head when he dared to ask the people of New Jersey to send him back to that body at the other end of this Capitol to again sell out the Democracy and make capital for another 15 years for the Republican Party.

I say I am not sore. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Just a little bit peeved. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mayhap. Still I have nothing against him in the world. [Laughter.] And I hope, my friends, from the bottom of my heart, that this somewhat conservative statement of mine this morning will not influence the former United States Senator to come out and declare for me, because if he does I am afraid I shall be defeated. [Laughter.] I want him to continue his fight. He said I would quit before he does. That is satisfactory to me. If I do, I hope I shall never be elected again to public office.

I repeat that I am not sore, and I mean that I am not sore. I have not a thing in all the world against the former United States Senator; personally he is a genial, likable, warm-hearted gentleman. I believe Kipling was right when he said—

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you;
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
But make allowance for their doubting, too:
If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Or being lied about, don't deal in lies;
Or being hated, don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good nor talk too wise;
If you can dream and not make dreams your master;
If you can think and not make thoughts your aim;
If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster,
And treat those two impostors just the same;
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools;
If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with kings, nor lose the common touch;
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you;
If all men count with you, but none too much;
If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run,
Yours is the Earth and everything that's in it,
And—which is more—you'll be a Man, my son!

I leave my future in the hands of the people of Hudson County. My political record has been made. I have voted on every important matter—currency, tariff, direct election of United States Senators. The moving finger having writ, moves on; and to-day I would not change a single vote that I have ever cast, either here or during my service at home. My future may be judged from my past. I have not been perfect, but I have honestly endeavored to represent my people. I have received great honors at their hands. If they see fit to terminate my political career, I can look back on 10 years of honest service and go back into the bosom of my family with my Democracy unquestioned and my honor untarnished, grateful to a loyal constituency.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Prolonged applause.]

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report (H. Rept. 1124) from the Joint Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, by Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, chairman of the joint committee on the part of the House, and the same was ordered printed.

CORRECTION OF A PENSION BILL.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions and take up for consideration House joint resolution 330. It is simply to correct a mistake in a name in a bill that has been passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the consideration of a House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report, and take it up and pass it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 330) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved April 24, 1914.

Whereas by error in printing the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 10138, approved April 24, 1914 (Private, No. 20), the name of one Joseph F. Barnard, late of Company C, Thirty-seventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read Joseph F. Isherwood: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in H. R. 10138, approved April 24, 1914 (Private, No. 20, 63d Cong.), granting a pension to one Deborah R. Isherwood be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Deborah R. Isherwood, former widow of Joseph F. Barnard, late of Company C, Thirty-seventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. We have passed a number of these resolutions, covering, I should suppose, in the neighborhood of a dozen cases, or perhaps more than that, reciting each time an error in printing, which was not true. Now, how did these errors actually occur?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not certain. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and I do not believe he is able to state whether it was his mistake or the mistake of the clerk or of the committee. If he can, I will ask him to so state to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. He would not know about that. It seems to me, if there are any more of these resolutions, it is only fair to the Clerk of the House and to the Printing Office to stop reciting that the error occurred through an error in printing, when that is not true. To put the House on record as stating that there was an error in printing is to charge it up to somebody as a matter of fault, and the right person is not charged, because I have no doubt whatever that the Printing Office printed these bills, following copy exactly.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know where the error occurred, but when a bill is passed and goes to the Pension Department for payment, and they find that it does not correspond with the records of the War Department, they notify our committee, and we ask to make the necessary correction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

SILETZ INDIAN RESERVATION, OREG.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Unanimous consent Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWLEY. When the House was in Committee of the Whole a week ago for the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, it considered H. R. 15803 extensively, and reported it to the House, and after having taken one vote on the previous question, the House adjourned because of the lack of a quorum. Is this bill in order at the present time? The previous question was pending.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill was considered by unanimous consent. The House gave unanimous consent for its consideration. It is undoubtedly the unfinished business to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think it is. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 15803) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians on the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAWLEY:
"Page 1, line 9, after the words 'section 3' insert the following:
"SEC. 3. That when such lands are surveyed and platted they shall be appraised and sold, except land reserved for water-power sites as provided in section 2 of this act, under the provisions of the revised statutes covering the sale of town sites located on the public domain."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin sends up a motion to recommit. Is the gentleman opposed to this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am opposed to it in its present form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "act," in line 2, page 2, to the end of the paragraph and insert the following: "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be paid to or expended for the benefit of the Indians entitled thereto in such manner and for such purposes as he may prescribe."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to have the bill conform to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. STAFFORD, there were—ayes 5, noes 57.

Accordingly the motion to recommit was rejected.

The bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. HAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SCHOOL LANDS IN OREGON.

The first business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 49) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10848) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the disposition and sale of lands known as the Klamath Indian Reservation," approved June 17, 1892 (27 Stat. L., pp. 52, 53).

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOMESTEAD RIGHTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15983) to restore homestead rights in certain cases.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has heretofore made homestead entry of lands embraced in a ceded Indian reservation, and who, in completion of the entry, has paid or shall have paid the purchase price fixed thereon as compensation for the benefit of the Indians, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead laws just as though such prior entry had not been made, if otherwise qualified: Provided, That the right of commutation of entries under this act shall not be permitted.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "price," strike out the words "fixed thereon as compensation for the benefit of the Indians," and insert in lieu thereof the words "provided in the law opening the land to settlement."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire: If we are to grant to some special class, as provided in this bill, namely, those who happen to have entered upon Indian reservation lands, the right to a second homestead entry, why should not the same privilege be extended to all who have entered upon Government land?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr Speaker, as the gentleman is aware, a few days ago we did pass a bill restoring the rights of those who lost homesteads on the public domain. This bill restores the homestead rights to those who bought and paid for Indian lands at competitive bids, plus interest, and so forth. I have an amendment which has been drawn after consultation with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which provides that they must have paid more than $5 an acre. I think with this amendment the gentleman will have no objection. It is as follows:

Add to the end of the bill: Provided further, That in the event that the purchase price so paid was less than $5 an acre this act shall not apply.

So that in no case will any man have a right to file again unless he has paid $5 or more per acre.

Mr. STAFFORD. It struck me that no person should be given a homestead right after he had availed himself of the privilege once.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the amendment which is to be offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma I shall have no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to say that the person who bought Indian lands——

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To reserve an objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to say that the person who bought Indian lands ought not to be deprived of a second homestead right for the reason that he was compelled to buy the Indian lands under competitive bids. The land I have in mind is such that all that could be obtained was $5 an acre or more, and sometimes it run as high as $20 an acre.

Mr. STAFFORD. A great deal of the Indian lands were sold for less than $5 an acre, and they should not have a second homestead right.

Mr. FERRIS. They will not get it under the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think they should have a second right under the public-land laws.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should they after they had availed themselves of the privilege once?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is a restricted privilege, a privilege that cost them a great deal of money.

Mr. STAFFORD. But they had the privilege.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They bought the Indian lands and paid for them in good faith, and settled on them before they could get them, and they should not be deprived of the rights of other American citizens to have a homestead right.

Mr. STAFFORD. They had the privilege once; there was nothing compulsory about compelling them to take the high-priced Indian lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is wrong when he says they have exercised their right to the public land. On these Indian lands they had to bid against other men, and in many cases paid high prices.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was the privilege of only American citizens, or those who had declared their intention to become such, and they availed themselves of the homestead right. It is only because the price is so fixed that I will not object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the moment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I have no disposition to object to the consideration of the bill, for I am in favor of it, but I will certainly be tempted to object if we are expected to accept the amendment proposed or suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. There is no logic at all in the amendment he offers. It is true that men who homesteaded Indian lands paid various prices for them. Some paid $1.25 an acre, and some paid much more; but in every case the price that was paid was supposed to fairly represent the value of the land to the Indian, the value over and above its value as a homestead right. There is no good reason why the man who only paid $2, $3, or $4 an acre should be denied this right which it is proposed to grant to the man who paid more. It is altogether probable that the homesteader who paid more than $5 an acre did obtain a really valuable piece of land and did secure a valuable piece of property; whereas many men who homesteaded Indian lands and paid from $1.25 an acre up and less than $5 for them obtained lands that were of very little value.

Under this proposed amendment practically none of the homesteaders of Indian lands in the Dakotas or the Northwest would secure this benefit. There might be a few gentlemen in Oklahoma, who secured valuable Indian lands, who would be given the right of a second entry.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am in favor of this bill in its present form. I understand the gentleman from Oklahoma to say that he is going to introduce an amendment providing the setting of a certain price which must have been paid for the Indian lands before the homesteader is entitled to the privileges granted by this bill. I believe that is unfair and illogical. If a homesteader has gone on an Indian reservation and has paid $5 or more an acre for his land, then under the proposed amendment he would be entitled to the privileges granted by this act. But if he goes on an Indian reservation and pays less than $5 an acre for the land, he would not be entitled to these privileges under the amendment to be proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The fact is that the man who has paid $5 or more an acre for any of this land has not paid relatively any more, when the real value of the land is considered, than the man who has paid less than $5 an acre. The man who has paid $5 an acre or more has secured better land, more valuable land, than the man who has paid less.

The bill in its present form seems to me to be logical, equitable, fair, and just. I am certainly opposed to the bill if it is going to be passed with any amendment fixing a certain price which must have been paid for the land before the privileges of the bill are extended to a homesteader. Such an amendment might satisfy the homesteaders down in Oklahoma, but we can not legislate in that way, and we should not legislate in that way. We should legislate for the whole country and not alone for Oklahoma. We should legislate in cases of this kind for North and South Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana, and all the public-land States.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from North Dakota both have Indians in their States. They have to come to Congress for many things. I have in my State more than one-third of the Indians of the United States, and I have to come here for many things. I can not get everything as I want it, and you gentlemen can not get everything as you want it. In my State the Government always sells lands at competitive bids. In your Northwestern States you sell them by appraisal, which is a highly preferable way for the investors. In my State every acre of land that is sold is put up at auction, as you would a horse on the street corner, and the people, under the excitement of competition, pay high prices. It was my intention to keep the price question out of this debate, but some gentlemen of the House thought that unless the purchaser paid a good fair price, for instance, $5 or more, that that person should have no renewal of the homestead right.

Now, let me give the gentleman an example of what a hardship it would work to a certain part of my own home county if this does not pass; it was opened under lottery plan, and they drew lots. Anyone that drew a lucky number took a piece of land at $1.25 an acre. In the same county under a later act of Congress they put the land up for sale at competitive bids, and it brought fabulous prices. Many paid so much that they never could build a house, never could plow it, and the result is that they have lost the land and lost their money. They need this act very badly. This act will do a great justice to some parties that need relief very badly. I hope the House will pass this bill.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Is it not a fact that in some cases where they bought farming and grazing lands appraised at $3.50 to $5 an acre they paid all the land was worth?

Mr. FERRIS. Probably they did. There is much truth in what the gentleman says.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to consideration of the bill, because I believe the gentleman's suggested amendment, if he proposes it, is so unfair that it will be defeated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I ought to object to the consideration of this bill, in view of the amendment which the gentleman from Oklahoma has suggested, but I do not feel justified in objecting to a bill simply because some one proposes to limit the effect of the bill, providing they can get votes enough to do so. Therefore, I shall not object, hoping that we can vote down the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] both talk as though they believed that everybody who has had one chance at the public domain ought to have another, regardless of those who have not had any chance. We have opened up a lot of Indian reservations. Thousands of people from my district have gone and endeavored to get a chance to get in on these openings, and they have not succeeded. It was largely done by the lottery system. The men who have succeeded are very well satisfied. They have sold out, and they want to get a chance to get in on another Indian opening. I am not in favor of giving a man a second chance in a lottery, where he has drawn the first prize on the first chance he has had.

Mr. MONDELL. But this second is not a lottery.

Mr. MANN. Certainly it is another Indian opening, and these people entitled to homestead entries will come in just as though they had never been to the first opening, and all of the Indian land that is good has not yet been taken. Unless I can feel quite confident that there is some limitation designed to allow some cases that the gentleman from Oklahoma may have, where people have paid an exorbitant price for poor land, and not allow it to cover every case where a man has had a good chance and taken it, I am not in favor of even letting the bill come up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "permitted," insert the words: "Provided further, That in the event the purchase price so paid was less than $5 per acre this act shall not apply."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma will not prevail. I think there is a good deal of equity in the proposition contained in the bill. A man who, in addition to being required to cultivate and improve and live upon his land as must a homestead settler, is called upon to pay for the land is not, in fact, securing the full benefits of the homestead law. At bottom that is the theory of this bill. We propose to give such a man one chance as a homesteader, and yet you do not give him all of the advantages of the ordinary homesteader, because you provide in the bill by a committee amendment that he shall not have the benefit of the commutation clause of the homestead law; so that he must reside upon his land the full period required under the homestead law.

It is entirely inequitable to divide these Indian homesteaders into two classes as is proposed. A man who bought Indian lands for $5 an acre or $10 an acre or $20 an acre might have obtained very much more for his money and for his homestead rights than the man who paid only a dollar and a quarter or two and a half dollars or three and a half dollars an acre. As a matter of fact, the men who have secured really valuable lands as homestead settlers on Indian reservations have been the men who have paid the higher prices—higher prices in some instances by reason of their securing the choicer tracts, higher prices in some cases because of the fertility of the land, because of its accessibility to market of its favorable conditions and surroundings, but in this amendment you say to a man who paid $5 an acre in Oklahoma for lands rich and fertile, in a humid region, with good railway transportation, adjacent to markets, "You may make another homestead entry," but to the man who homesteaded in Wyoming or the Dakotas, far from railways, far from markets, on some semiarid lands, of comparatively little value, who paid $2 or $3 or $4, you say, "You have exhausted your rights, and we do not propose to give you any further opportunity as a homestead settler."

Mr. Speaker, it is possible that there may be some basis on which we could divide these Indian claimants so as to allow a second entry to those most entitled to a second entry, but we certainly do not accomplish that by the sort of amendment which is proposed, and I hope and trust the amendment will not be adopted. If the bill is amended as proposed, it would be of no value at all so far as the reservation homesteaders in my State are concerned, because none of them paid as much as $5 an acre, and yet all paid all that the land was worth. It would not benefit the homestead settlers in Montana, and I refer to Montana because in that great State there have been vast areas of Indian lands opened and sold; and I think none was sold for $5 an acre or above, or, if so, but a comparatively small area, and it would be unjust and inequitable and unfair to make the distinction between homestead settlers on Indian lands that is proposed in this amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to oppose the amendment, which, I understand, is to make the bill applicable only in cases where the price paid for the land is $5 an acre or more. Is that correct, I will ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if this bill has any merit, and I think it has, it ought not to discriminate between those who file upon land where the price is less than $5 an acre, and, as stated by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], it will operate to do a great injustice to a large number of persons who have just as much right to make a second entry as those who may have paid $5 per acre, for if an entryman who paid that price is entitled to a second entry, then one who only paid $4 per acre should also have that right. A strong objection to this amendment is that it will make the bill really applicable almost entirely to settlers on the Kiowa and Comanche Indian Reservations in Oklahoma, though I do not believe the gentleman in offering the amendment had in mind that he was proposing legislation that would apply only within his own State.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, there is some there that sold for $6 an acre.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say one objection to this amendment, which the gentleman from Wyoming did not propose, and one that ought to defeat it, is the unfair way it would affect settlers in many of the States. In my State we have a law in regard to the disposition of surplus lands within Indian reservations, and similar laws obtain to lands in Montana and perhaps in North Dakota. The price was fixed under the law in two or three instances I have in mind of lands taken within a period of three months after the proclamation of the President, and the price is fixed at $6 per acre. All lands taken after three months and before the expiration of six months the price is $4 per acre and lands filed upon after that $2.50 per acre. Other cases the law provided for an appraisement, and in my State in one reservation there was a very small portion of land opened to settlement appraised at $6 an acre, much of it at $4, and the balance as low as $2 and $2.50.

Now, if you adopt this amendment you will have the department, it seems to me, where it is going to be very confusing and difficult to determine who is entitled to make a second entry and who is not. There is not any difference between the man who filed upon the land in Tripp County, S. Dak., for instance, at $6, or a man who filed three months later and paid $4. The man who paid $4 an acre did not get as good land as the man who paid $6 an acre, and that is true of lands that are appraised, and therefore this amendment ought not to be adopted. I am in accord with what the bill contemplates, and I have no doubt that the gentleman from Oklahoma, in proposing this amendment, had in mind a large number of people who are now upon lands that they have purchased under these acts proposing to sell surplus lands in Indian reservations that are clamoring now for free homes and are petitioning Congress and appealing to the Members who come from those regions to enact legislation to relieve them from paying anything for the lands; and the gentleman, believing as I believe that such legislation is not possible, is now proposing to substitute by this bill something that he believes ought to satisfy that class of people. I hope the bill will pass, but I hope the amendment will be disagreed to, and unless it is rejected I shall not vote for the bill unless it be amended so that it will apply only to lands within the State of Oklahoma. I do not want a law that favors one who may have made an entry in a reservation in my State and does not benefit another who made an entry at the same time in the same reservation, the only difference between them being that one paid $5 per acre and the other only $4 per acre.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the theory of this legislation and the reason for it is clearly that the homesteader who has taken land upon an Indian reservation and paid the appraised price for the land has not secured the full benefit of his homestead rights; that he is in a different position from a man who has gone upon the public domain and used his homestead right and secured title to the land without any payment or with a payment of merely the commutation fee. Now, the amendment proposes that the right for a second homestead shall not be granted to a homesteader who has gone upon an Indian reservation and taken up lands on the reservation and has not paid a price of $5 or more an acre. The provision of the amendment is certainly illogical and unfair. A homesteader who has gone upon an Indian reservation in Montana and paid $2.50 an acre has paid the full value for the land just as much as the homesteader who has gone upon an Indian reservation in Oklahoma and paid $6 an acre for the land there. In both cases it is fair to presume that the homesteader in paying the appraised price of the land has paid its full value.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois, in opposition to the bill in its present form, says that a great many of his constituents have been and are now desirous of securing homesteads on these Indian reservations that in the past few years have been opened to settlement. I want to say to the gentleman that to-day in the West there is a large amount of land in Indian reservations that have been open to settlement during the last few years that has not been filed upon, and that if there is any one constituent in his district or 100 or more of his constituents who desire to obtain good farm lands in the West, and who are willing to undergo the hardships of pioneer settlement, I shall take great pleasure in directing them to Indian reservations in North Dakota, South Dakota, and in Montana, where they can secure those homestead lands to-day. Also, in these States they can secure good farm lands on the public domain, where, if they comply with the homestead laws, they will not be obliged to pay anything for the land. Now, if there is a single man anywhere in this country who has not used his homestead right who wants a homestead and is willing to comply with the homestead laws and undergo the trials and troubles attending homesteading, all that is necessary for him to do is to go to one of these Western States and make entry upon some of this fertile, productive, unappropriated land.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question, and I ask to be recognized for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], does the gentleman understand this bill to provide that in case a man has made an entry on a piece of land that was formerly part of an Indian reservation, and paid the price required, completed that entry, secured title, disposed of it, then he could go and enjoy the privilege of a homesteader—still have the right to take another piece of land on the public domain?

Mr. NORTON. I so understand the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I will ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] did he understand the question which I just propounded?

Mr. FERRIS. No. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. The question is this: Does this give an entryman who has secured a piece of the public domain which once was part of an Indian reservation, and has secured title to it—does this give him the right to go somewhere else and take out a second homestead?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; if he has paid the full Indian price.

Mr. MILLER. On what theory?

Mr. FERRIS. The theory is that he has paid what the land is worth, and the requirement of the homestead feature at all was only to keep down speculation.

Mr. MILLER. In some cases that is entirely true; in other cases not. Has it not been frequently the case that when the price was fixed consideration was given to the fact that the entryman had to live on the land and comply with all the requirements of the homestead law? It is a hardship to live on the land to fulfill these requirements, and this feature ought to be considered.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is a member of the Indian Committee, and he ought to know about this matter better than I. But the gentleman is well aware of the fact that in some parts of the country they put up ceded Indian land at auction and sell it for what it is worth, and sometimes for much more than it is worth.

Mr. MILLER. What the gentleman from Oklahoma has now stated is entirely true. There has been a very great degree of hardship on the part of a lot of men who thought they were getting something that was all right and fair, when as a matter of fact they paid about 10 times too much for their "whistle." So far as that class is concerned, I can see a very good reason for legislation of this character; but this is very sweeping and broad.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me tell the gentleman what happened in my county. The real estate men controlled these new Indian countries when they were first opened. They boomed them up and told every easy mark that came along that the land was worth $50 an acre, and would grow this or that or the other product, which did not happen, on account of lack of rainfall or other conditions. After making their yearly payments one year after another, when five years have rolled along and they have starved through that period, they have had to mortgage their land to make these Indian payments and pay interest, and then what happens? They sell out their holdings for a few hundred dollars and load a chicken coop and a few of their household goods on a wagon and drive off somewhere else—to New Mexico or Arizona, where there is public land. After a man has lived five years on the land and paid the Indian price, it ought not to exhaust his homestead rights. I think the gentleman from Minnesota will agree with me on that.

Mr. MILLER. I agree with the gentleman as to the merits of the bill respecting the class of people the gentleman has just mentioned, but——

Mr. FERRIS. That is the way it works out.

Mr. MILLER. But that is only a small part. If we had a list of the number of people who have bought lands on Indian reservations, the number would doubtless surprise some gentlemen. If the gentleman will stop for a moment, he will recall that the average price for a long time was $1.25 an acre, and that is the price now on many Indian reservations as provided by law and treaty.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is on the Indian Committee, and he knows that in one section of the country it has been the common practice—and I think the correct one, although I did not think so once, but I do now—to put a fixed price on the land, and that appraised price is allowed to govern. But the gentleman knows that down in my State, when the land is disposed of, almost uniformly they put it up at auction and auction it off. Now, to say that there is no distinction between the one case and the other is not quite fair. Of course the gentleman knows that the bill as reported applies to all the States having Indian lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota will be interested in knowing what the precedent is for this legislation. On May 17, 1900, the last free-home law was enacted, and that relieved those who had filed upon homesteads on lands that were formerly within Indian reservations, where they had to pay for their lands the price that was required. It occurred to me that those who had commuted and paid would be asking for some relief, and I introduced a bill that provided that where a person had commuted who otherwise would have been relieved if he had waited and not made proof until after May 17, 1900, he would have a right to make a second homestead entry.

Now, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has a situation in his district, in what was formerly a part of the Kiowa and Comanche Indian Reservation, where the lands were sold at a high price—were sold for more than they were worth—and he is undoubtedly seeking to give some relief to the settlers who are his constituents by passing a bill that will give them the right to make another entry, not believeing that it is possible to secure relief from paying the price which they have contracted to pay.

I can not see any difference, really, between the situation in Oklahoma and the situation in other parts of the country where a man has paid $6, say, in the Cheyenne River Reservation in South Dakota and another man who has paid $4 because he took land not appraised as high, and therefore not so good; and I can not see why the $6 man should have the right to make another entry and not the $4 man.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. I ask for an extension of five minutes, in order that these other gentlemen may have an opportunity to express their opinions.

Mr. MONDELL. Some years ago, in my early service in the House, I introduced a bill, which became a law, granting second homesteads to those who had commuted under the homestead law—not Indian homesteaders, but homesteaders generally. Congress passed that act because it was considered that a man who had commuted and paid $1.25 or $2.50 an acre for his land had not secured the full benefits of the homestead law. It gave him a second homestead right, but provided that he could not commute that second homestead right.

Now, this bill is drawn on the same theory—that the Indian homesteader has not enjoyed the full benefits of the homestead law; that he ought to be allowed to enjoy the full benefits of the homestead law.

The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has referred to a bill which he introduced and succeeded in having Congress adopt, under which we gave some of the Indian homesteaders the benefits of a second homestead. This bill is more general in its provisions.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that the cases that were affected by the bill that I introduced and had passed were cases where parties had made proofs after they had lived upon the land long enough to acquire title without paying anything if it had not been that they were required to pay the Indian price. By the act of May 17, 1900, those who had not made proof were relieved. Therefore I thought those who had paid, who would have been entitled to that relief if they had waited until after that date, ought to have something offered to them as a consolation prize, and therefore I introduced a bill that gave them the right to make another homestead entry, but without the right of commutation.

Mr. MONDELL. I voted for the gentleman's bill, and I thought it was a good bill; but this bill is rather more equitable, in that it covers all those cases.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, while I have always felt the utmost sympathy for men engaged in trying to make homes out of the public domain under our laws, I must confess that I do not see the equity or the reasonableness of this particular bill. I appreciate very much the force of what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says respecting a certain class of entrymen on Indian lands, but their difficulties are not the difficulties of the great mass of entrymen on Indian lands. We are legislating touching a whole group of individuals because of the troubles of a small number of the entire group; and while I shall not indulge in any further remarks on the bill I do want to state here now that I do not believe it is fair or equitable to the general public, and I do not believe it is in the line of wise legislation respecting the public domain. I do not think the homestead laws ought to be cheapened like this. One thing is certain, it seems to me; that is, that a man who had the advantage of going upon the Indian ceded lands to make a home out of 160 acres and failed will never succeed in making a home out of any other 160 acres that you may give him anywhere else in the United States. He is a failure; so you are not going, in the end, to help him very much. It seems to me it would be nearer equity if we should take the cases of the entrymen cited by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] where the sums paid were altogether too high, and try in some way to alleviate their immediate distress, and give them some benefit, rather than legislate for the entire class of entrymen on Indian lands.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Oklahoma want to make a request in reference to the length of debate on this section and all amendments thereto, this being unanimous-consent day?

Mr. FERRIS. I think I will.

Mr. MANN. I would like five minutes myself.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of seven minutes, five minutes of which shall be yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and two minutes to myself on behalf of the committee if I need it, debate close on all amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that debate close on this amendment and all other amendments to the section in seven minutes.

Mr. FERRIS On this section and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois and two to the gentleman from Oklahoma. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will be agreed to. The gentleman from Oklahoma has a peculiar case in his State, and he is seeking to cover that case by general legislation. It may be perfectly proper to provide for the case which the gentleman has in mind, but without the limitation suggested by the amendment offered by the gentleman the bill is wide open all over the United States.

Only a few days ago we agreed to a conference report upon a bill, which I suppose has gone to the President by this time, granting the right to a second or third homestead entry, with certain limitations and restrictions; but if this bill should pass in the form suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURKE], this would grant a second homestead entry without any restrictions whatever where the land was in a ceded reservation. Now, does the gentleman desire to make it easier for somebody in an Indian reservation who has taken a homestead to take a second homestead than for people outside of the Indian reservations in his own State?

These gentlemen agreed the other day to give second homestead entries only within restrictions where people have not sold their rights. That applies to most of the people in the State who have taken homestead entries. I do not think the gentleman now desires to give a preference right, without any restrictions, to those who have taken homesteads in Indian reservations, because in many cases where there has been commutation of homestead entries they have paid just the same outside of the Indian reservation that they have inside of the Indian reservation.

Mr. NORTON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. MANN. If he desires me to yield for a question.

Mr. NORTON. I was going to ask the gentleman if he did not think it was logical to grant this right to the homesteaders who have paid the appraised price of land included in Indian reservations?

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any logic in reference to the matter, one way or the other. We are giving a preference right. It is a gratuity which we are presenting to somebody. We have the right to fix the terms upon which we fix this gratuity. Now, if there are some people who, either through competitive bidding or otherwise, have paid an excessively high price for very poor land, as I am informed is the case, it may be perfectly proper that we should give them a second homestead right, without changing the situation as to all the others. These others have the second homestead right now by the bill we passed the other day if they have not sold out their rights.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MANN. For a brief question.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think it is fair to grant this right to a man on an Indian reservation who has paid $5 an acre and deny it to a man who has paid $4.50 an acre for the land?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Dakota does not attribute to me the powers of a reasoning being. I am making a speech in favor of the proposition, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. I am glad the gentleman is for the bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman talks about logic. There is no question of logic in the price of the public domain; there is no logic about charging a man $1.25 an acre when he makes the commutation. We fix the price. It is not a question of logic; it is a question of fixing the price. We fix the prices usually much below the value of the land in the West. We give the people out there the benefit of the public domain, which belongs to the whole country. Having gone in and gotten the benefit of a homestead entry under competitive conditions and under a lottery system, and having made some money out of that, they want to come in and get a chance over again. I think we ought to be careful about giving them a chance the second time.

If they have a hardship in some particular case, very well. We have extended the time of payment time and again on Indian reservations, without objection—by unanimous consent. We have been very fair and very reasonable to most of these people. Undoubtedly they have met with hardship, but I can not see the logic, referring to my friend's question—I can not see the logic of trying to get people on a homestead to sell out, move to some other place, and take up a new homestead. The best thing they can do is to stay where they are and cultivate the land that they have already obtained.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, it is due, in all frankness, to say that I offered the amendment under consideration after conference with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but I could not in good conscience say there is not a distinct difference between a man who goes out in the open market to compete, and pays a large and exorbitant price, and those who go and pick out land at an appraised price, which is usually much less than it is worth. I have reported the bill, as it shows, without the amendment, but the gentleman from Illinois suggested the amendment, and I agreed to offer it. I desire to keep full faith with him, and I ask that the amendment be agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRISON). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURKE of South Dakota) there were 22 ayes and 7 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "reservation," insert the words "within the State of Oklahoma."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING SITE AT VINELAND, N. J.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16642) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard section 33 of the public buildings act of March 4, 1913, as to site at Vineland, N. J.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to disregard that portion of section 33 of the public buildings act, approved March 4, 1913, which requires that the Federal building site selected at Vineland, N. J., shall be bounded on at least two sides by streets.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the bill was considered at the last session I sought to obtain some information as to the reason for waiving the general law, which provides that the proposed site shall be bounded on at least two sides by streets. Under the existing law we are aware public buildings must not have any other building nearer than 40 feet on either side. If we waive the provisions of the general law that the site shall not be bounded by at least two streets, why should not we restrict the light and air space of 40 feet on either side of the building?

I would like to ask the gentleman interested in the bill as to the size of the proposed site and the size of the proposed building to be erected on that site, the frontage of the lot on the principal thoroughfare on which it is proposed to erect the public building.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the gentleman said, which will be found on page 13875 of the RECORD, it is proper that the House should know about the reasons for the location of the post office as indicated by the bill. The gentleman's conception of what Vineland is is contained in the statement made at that time, but it is so inadequate and mistaken that in justice to him and to the House some facts should be made known. I have some facts here which I will give briefly for the information of the House.

Vineland is located about halfway between Philadelphia and Atlantic City.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is on the old West Jersey Railroad?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; and the Jersey Central road. Both roads pass through the city—30 passenger trains a day. It is a city of 12,000 inhabitants. It has a high school and 20 other schools. It has about 3,000 school children, who are pupils in the schools. It has over 60 teachers in those schools. It has a public library of 10,000 volumes and a circulation of 50,000. It has a historical building. It has factories, and manufactures goods annually to the value of millions of dollars. It is a place of very great importance as a school center. There are located here three public institutions, one for the care of the veteran soldiers, a splendid place established by the Government. Another is a place for the care and training of feeble-minded children; another for feeble-minded women. Vineland is a place that has a great reputation for the public spirit of the city. Its business is such that it is incomparable; it is away beyond places of its size in the activity that there obtains.

Now, as to the post office, the business of the post office this last year was over $28,000. The business in the money-order department alone was nearly $200,000, covering some 20,000 different orders issued and orders paid, so that it will give you some idea of the degree and importance of the place for a post office of dimension.

This location is a piece of ground in the center of the city. It has a frontage on the main avenue of 150 feet and a depth of 150 feet, so that it would afford to the building light and air, and on every account is entirely desirable. Every business man there wants it located at that place, because the city is growing and it is central, and it is convenient of access. The trolley line passes by it. The matter of fire protection was spoken of. They have the most complete system of fire protection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to whether any other site has been considered for the location of this post office, which would meet the requirements of the general law for a corner lot, bounded by two streets?

Mr. BAKER. One corner was examined by the inspector and he recommended this point, because the corner that he found was outside the line of traffic, in the first instance, and it was out of the center where it ought to be, with relation to the business development of the place. It was not as large, and it would cost more money.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many sites were offered as proposed sites?

Mr. BAKER. Two sites that I have heard of.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman know why the citizens of Vineland are not sufficiently interested in having this public building constructed there so as to have offered for sale to the Government a corner lot? Is property so valuable there that they could not, as in the case of other public buildings throughout the country, provide a corner lot for this Government building?

Mr. BAKER. I know that they are in favor of this site. I do not know that any movement was made to have a site given by the city. I did not know that the Government of the United States was insisting on having that kind of a donation. I know that these people are very enterprising, very public spirited. It is a strong Republican city, for that matter, and they do an immense amount of business. That they should be asked to furnish this Government with a location from which to transact its business is a matter that had not come to my attention. I take it that the Treasury Department, through its agencies, will see to it that the Government is not imposed upon in the acquisition of a proper site.

Mr. NORTON. From this bill it looks as though they were somewhat disgusted with the present administration and desire to put this building off on some inside location, unlike other towns of the country.

Mr. BAKER. I know this, that there are no private interests being served. It is a matter of the public weal that is being considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand from the luminous exposition of the matter there were two sites proposed, one on a corner and the other an inside site?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee how far removed from the center of the town is the corner site?

Mr. BAKER. The corner site would be about two squares away from this place and on a side street. My information about that comes entirely from the report of the inspector.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman is not acquainted with the site itself?

Mr. BAKER. I know where it is located. I have passed along the site. I have been in the city.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not acquainted with the second site proposed for this post office?

Mr. BAKER. I know where the location is. The corner location is smaller, and it has a building upon it, which makes the extra cost in the acquisition of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. What are the respective costs of the two sites?

Mr. BAKER. The corner site could be had for $14,000, and the site that they desire can be had for $12,000. With what knowledge I have of values I think that price is very low. It was the site of a church, which has been removed within the last year, and those people who owned the church are willing to sell it at the sum of $12,000, and I know that land next to it has been selling at a rate per foot that would make it worth $15,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have some member of the committee, if the gentleman can not furnish me the information, tell us why we should adhere, if we permit this inside tract to be purchased, to the requirement that there should be 40 feet area on either side of the building line. It seems 150 feet frontage on the principal thoroughfare of a city of 6,000 population——

Mr. BAKER. It has twice that population.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is quite considerable.

Mr. BAKER. The ground is desirable. The dimensions are desirable. The place is growing rapidly, and if you were to put a building on the center front of 50 feet, or 80 feet, you would still have 40 feet clear on either side.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was wondering why we should follow that rule, if we are going to abandon the rule which requires the building to be upon a corner lot, or on a lot facing two streets—why should we also insist that there should be 40 feet on each side of free light and air given to the adjoining property owners? Why would not 20 feet on either side, or 15 feet, be sufficient to safeguard the interests of the Government? We are buying an unusual amount of land.

Mr. BAKER. And getting it for less than a less amount of land would cost.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe anybody is so charitable, even in the borough of Vineland, as to give the property to the Government below the market price.

Mr. BAKER. I am simply stating the fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the right to object until some member of the committee can furnish me with some information as to why they do not reduce the requirement of law as to the space on either side, if we are going to have an inside lot.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it not true that the Government requires a certain space on either side of a public building?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government requires 40 feet space on each side of the building, and that is predicated upon the idea that it is a corner lot. Here we are departing from that policy and permitting an inside lot to be furnished. It strikes me that in buying land larger than necessary, for the convenience of the adjoining property owners, who may have——

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. It simply means, of course, that we get it at a cheaper price than we can a corner lot.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recognizes that 150 feet is pretty large; 70 feet will be utilized for the building proper and there will be 40 feet on either side. Of course it will be quite attractive and desirable for the borough of Vineland to have a building located there, for which 100 feet would be ample for public purposes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. You can not get a corner lot without it being much more expensive. If it is built on a corner, it will be more expensive.

Mr. BAKER. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection. I assume the responsibility, saying that it is in the interest of the Government and the people, and that this ought to be done.

Mr. VARE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. VARE. Is it not a fact that this land is all in one piece, and certainly the Government would not buy seven-eighths of it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I know my good friend from Philadelphia spends a large part of the time in New Jersey, and the gentleman, undoubtedly, in going to and from Atlantic City, became very well acquainted with this property, and based upon his statement, which corroborates that of the gentleman from New Jersey, who knows at first hand of the conditions, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LONERGAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESERVATION OF CERTAIN MINERAL SPRINGS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12050) reserving from entry, location, or sale lots 1 and 2, in section 33, township 13 south, range 4 west, New Mexico prime meridian, in Sierra County, N. Mex., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That lots 1 and 2, in section 33, township 13 south, range 4 west, New Mexico prime meridian, situated in the county of Sierra, State of New Mexico, be hereby set apart from the public domain and reserved from entry, location, or sale for the purpose of preserving for the use of the public the valuable mineral springs located upon said lots.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to control the use of said lots and the waters thereon, and to make regulations for the government of the reservation, and to make such contracts, agreements, and leases as will best preserve them for the use of the public; and all moneys received from such contracts, agreements, and leases by way of remuneration, or from any other source in connection with this reservation, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a special fund to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior for the protection, maintenance, and improvement of said reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see the latter part of section 2 of the bill provides that any money coming in by way of lease or otherwise shall be paid into the Treasury as a special fund to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior for the protection, maintenance, and improvement of said reservation. Well, I am not sure whether Congress can in that way appropriate money which is paid into the Treasury, and hence it might not amount to anything, but does the gentleman think that we should create special funds out of these little matters, or, rather, pay the money into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts so that Congress has control over it when it wishes to appropriate it?

Mr. FERGUSSON. I will state, as to the first proposition, that the Secretary of the Interior, when petitioned for the building of another hotel or any other expense or enlarging of the springs, digging them out, and making them more available, will have a fund out of which he can pay for those things for this particular work at those springs.

Mr. MANN. Should not the Secretary of the Interior, if he wants to do any work of that sort, receive appropriations from the Congress?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Well, I understand it will take a special appropriation every time there is anything to be done to further improve the springs, while under this proposition, whatever terms he makes with the lessees to put up a hotel, for instance, and distribute the waters through it for use—whatever terms he makes with them, by way of leases, charging a rent, big or little, will be simply for the purpose of further improving the springs as may appear advisable.

Mr. MANN. I suppose this bill was drawn probably in the department, and it ought to have been drawn in proper form. Perhaps it is.

Mr. FERGUSSON. It was.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is the Constitution says that no money can be paid out of the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress, so that I doubt whether he can pay this money after it has been paid in; but we have made a rule here in the House for some years not to create special funds to be controlled by any department, but to have the money paid into the Treasury, subject to appropriations by Congress, and recently we extended that even to the Reclamation Service. We did the same thing in reference to the oil wells out West the other day, when the Navy Department claimed oil wells, and we provided that it should be paid in as a fund subject to appropriation by Congress. I am not willing to have Congress reverse itself by unanimous consent unless the gentleman will agree to an amendment covering that proposition.

Mr. FERGUSSON. I would rather agree to an amendment than to have the bill defeated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not give these springs to New Mexico?—although I do not think they will take them, from the experience we had with the Sulphur Springs.

Mr. FERGUSSON. I would rather have the bill passed as it is, and there is some necessity for this provision. These springs are near big mining camps, and they have lately become accessible in this sense. They are near the Elephant Butte Dam and 16 miles from the railroad. There has been built to transport material from the railroad to the dam a magnificent road, and there was also a splendid bridge built across the river at the same time. Up until within two or three years these springs were practically inaccessible, because the river could not be crossed unless at low water, when it could be forded, and therefore they were practically inaccessible. Since it has become accessible people have come there to live in tents and little shacks; but this will encourage the sick people to come in greater numbers, knowing they will get better accommodations. This bill as I have introduced it was first passed on by the Secretary of the Interior, and the sole object of it is not to require the Government to expend money, not even one cent, but to provide a method by which the springs may be self-supporting and, in time, to produce the means for their enlargement and improvement to meet the large demand now existing and that is certain to grow very rapidly as knowledge of their accessibility and conveniences and comforts become more widely known.

Now, with respect to the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. To my mind, it is much better for me to have the bill amended as he has suggested than not to get the relief that is really and truly demanded. The cures performed at these springs—and I have known of them for 25 years myself, personally—are mainly cures of poor people, miners, and cowboys, and other people who can not go off to the fine, expensive springs. These springs are close to where they live, in the big mining communities. I would be glad to have them permanently improved, but nobody will put up a building to serve the purposes of the community there unless he gets a lease for a long enough term to justify him in doing it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment granting these tracts to the State of New Mexico, as I suggested some time ago?

Mr. FERGUSSON. No. I am thoroughly satisfied that that would defeat the bill. I am so advised by Members with much greater experience than mine; and where there are one or two objections now there would be a dozen on this floor and in the other body to such a proposition as that. I am anxious to get this legislation enacted, not to please myself nor to please any particular man who wants to put up a hotel, but because I know of my own knowledge that the poor people are suffering from lack of use of these springs.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSSON. I do.

Mr. GOULDEN. What are the medicinal qualities of this water? I heard the gentleman mention that they were curative. What are they good for?

Mr. FERGUSSON. For rheumatism and other diseases of the blood.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I hope in view of the general conditions confronting the House, while we are opening up a general sanitarium of this kind, no one will object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, anyone familiar with the situation that has developed at Hot Springs, Ark., would be unwilling that the Government should enter further upon such a process. I suggest to the gentleman that he allow his bill to go over for the present.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman has an amendment, will he let me know the purport of it? If the gentleman demands that it go over, I will be willing to have that done. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

SETTLEMENT OF CERTAIN ACCOUNTS UNDER THE RECLAMATION ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 124) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and settle certain accounts under the reclamation acts, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER LABOR DAY.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns next Saturday, the 5th of September, it adjourn over Labor Day to meet the following Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns next Saturday it adjourn to meet on Tuesday following.

Mr. MANN. Why not make it Friday?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Well, I will make it Friday. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, and ask that when the House adjourns Friday it adjourn to meet on the following Tuesday, September 8.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois amends his request and asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn next Friday it be to meet on Tuesday following. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects. Does the gentleman object to the modification or to the original request?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object to both propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OIL OR GAS LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15661) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to lease to the occupants thereof certain unpatented lands on which oil or gas has been discovered.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States, within six months from the date of this act, by any locator or his successors in interest of his or their claim to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal, upon which oil or gas had been discovered, was being produced, or upon which drilling operations were in actual progress January 1, 1914, and the claim to which land was initiated prior to July 3, 1910, the Secretary of the Interior shall lease to such locator or his successors in interest the said lands so relinquished, not exceeding, however, the maximum area of 2,560 acres to any one person, association, or corporation, said leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of a royalty of not exceeding one-eighth of the oil or gas extracted or produced from the leased premises or the proceeds thereof, each lease to be for a period of 20 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for succeeding periods of 10 years, upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts, and make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect, and all leases or assignments of leases shall be subject to such rules and regulations, and the failure of any lessee or of his successor or successors to comply with the terms and conditions of the lease shall work a forfeiture of the same, to be declared by a court of competent jurisdiction.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, strike out the word "shall," in line 1, and insert "may in his discretion."

In line 2, page 2, after the word "lease," insert the words "on such reasonable terms and conditions as he may prescribe."

Page 2, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "two thousand five hundred and sixty" and insert "six hundred and forty."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object. Is it the thought of the gentleman from Illinois that this matter can be disposed of when we reach the general leasing bill?

Mr. FOSTER. It is hoped that it might be.

Mr. MONDELL. The difficulty is that the general leasing bill will not come up for some days, and in all probability will not become a law at this session.

The situation is this, speaking now only of my own State: There are a few—not many—oil-land claimants who believe they are entitled to their lands, but rather than continue long-drawn-out contests with the Government they would be willing to take a lease and surrender their claim to a title. While the matter is pending they do not feel like going on with their drilling operations and developing the property. They fear that that might result in large expenditures for which they would secure nothing if the decision is finally against them.

If we were going to dispose of the general leasing bill immediately and could take care of the matter in that way, that would be entirely satisfactory, but I think that is impossible. I think it is generally understood that the general leasing bill will not become a law at this session, and the matter therefore will go over for some time. Meanwhile there are these parties anxious to develop the wells, and the country is anxious to get the product, but they can not develop their wells under the present conditions.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is it provided in this bill that the royalties shall not exceed one-eighth?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I had nothing to do with the fixing of the royalty, but it occurs to me as being entirely proper, because that is almost the universal oil royalty.

Mr. FOSTER. That is probably so in most instances, but yet I do not see why it should be said in a bill, that they shall lease it at not to exceed that, and fix a maximum which can never be exceeded.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that is altogether a vital matter; but speaking on that particular point, it does seem to me that it is better for Congress to determine what is to be done than to leave it to the discretion of some official.

Mr. FOSTER. Then there is another provision here. The committee have stricken out 2,560 acres and have inserted 640 acres. Is the gentleman in favor of that amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. The committee has reduced the area.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. That is not entirely satisfactory to me; but I doubt if there are many people in my State who own more than that acreage that they would desire to bring within this act. I am not informed there are; I have heard no complaint or protest against that provision.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe there are many oil leases that cover even 640 acres. If there is really oil in the ground, I should think that 640 acres would be a large lease.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman understand that quite frequently men have gone upon land, or are claiming land, only a small portion of which contains oil in any considerable quantity?

Mr. FOSTER. I know that. I live in an oil country.

Mr. MONDELL. Sometimes a man must have quite a considerable acreage in order to have any substantial amount of product.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true. Sometimes a man has a large acreage and no product.

Mr. MONDELL. That has been my experience.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that fixing a maximum beyond which they could not go, of one-eighth of the oil, is unwise. A good lease might be worth a good deal more. The gentleman knows that. Some leases call for one-sixth of the oil, and others for one-eighth.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not know of any private leases anywhere that call for more than one-eighth, and many of them less.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; it depends on the amount produced from each well each day. That might govern the amount that might be exacted as a royalty.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that while I believe Congress ought to fix the royalty, and I hope that in the leasing bill it will do so, still in order to relieve these cases I do not think that provision is absolutely essential, although I think it is a sound provision.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is important that a bill of this kind should be passed whereby this Government land may be developed, because if there is private oil land around it that is being developed, unless the Government land is developed, probably there will not be any oil left in it.

Mr. MONDELL. In my State there are not many of these cases, but there are some in a field that is being developed, where this additional development is needed, but where the parties do not feel justified in making improvements and sinking more wells, because of the uncertainty of finally securing title. They would be willing to accept a lease in lieu of title because of that uncertainty.

Mr. FOSTER. If they are there for the purpose of securing the oil, a lease is all they want. It does not matter whether they get title to the ground or not.

Mr. MONDELL. No; this particular ground has no value except for oil.

Mr. FOSTER. In any other case, if they are there simply to get the oil out, they may not want to buy the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to the number of acres of land in his State that are now in contest to which this bill is applicable?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not pretend to know, but I doubt if there are over a score or so of entrymen, perhaps, claiming from 160 acres upward, who would want to come under the act; possibly a very few.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are some contests now pending before the Land Commissioner, or in the courts, as to the title to the oil lands, are there?

Mr. MONDELL. No; not in the courts. There are applications that have been made for patents and the department has not decided them. I will say to the gentleman that there are some cases where the question involved is as to the force and effect of what is known as the Roosevelt withdrawals, and as to whether these parties were actually in possession and drilling at the time of the congressional withdrawals, and the department seems to be slow in deciding those questions. The Federal courts have held that the original withdrawal was of no force or effect, and the Supreme Court has not passed upon it. There are not many cases, but it happens that those few cases are in a developing field, and they are willing to accept a lease rather than wait for the title under the circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think that in place of saying that the royalty shall be not to exceed one-eighth, the matter should be left to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. No; my opinion is that we should say not more than one-tenth; but as the bill says not more than one-eighth I am content to leave it that way. I think that in all these cases that would be the better thing to do. That is my personal opinion. There is ground for difference of opinion, as I realize.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I am individually concerned, I have never seen a lease which called for a royalty of less than one-eighth, and they have exceeded that. One-eighth is the least amount that has usually been asked.

Mr. MONDELL. One-tenth is, I think, a frequent lease in my State.

Mr. FOSTER. I have never come across such a lease.

Mr. MONDELL. There are quite a number of them that are one-eighth. I know of none more than that.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. What is the royalty provided in the leasing bill that is come before the House?

Mr. RAKER. It does not fix any. It is left to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. What objection is there to putting that provision in this bill, leaving it to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. There is this difference: In these cases a man is actually giving up a claim which in the majority of cases he thinks is an excellent one, to land on which he is spending a great deal of money, and he feels that if he is going to surrender his right to a patent, he ought to know pretty definitely what he is going to receive. I think that even if we do not prescribe the royalty or fix the royalty in the general bill, that where you are proposing as in this case that a man shall surrender his claim to a patent, he ought to know what sort of a bargain he is going to make.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is right; but I think the Secretary of the Interior ought to fix that and not to make it a minimum of one-eighth.

Mr. MONDELL. We would hope that the Secretary would make it about the ordinary lease, which is one-eighth, and allow the man to surrender his rights.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know about that.

Mr. RAKER. Suppose he does not surrender?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is fair that the Secretary should fix the lease. You might in some cases not want to pay one-eighth, and in other cases it might be right to pay a larger royalty. I think the Secretary of the Interior ought to have the right to fix the royalty.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not agree with the gentleman on the royalty proposition either in this case or generally, but in this class of cases you are asking a man to surrender property rights.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe we do that where we give him a great deal of land, where we offer him 640 acres of ground, which is a large lease.

Mr. MONDELL. That depends upon how much oil there is under it.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will offer the amendment. I would like to reduce the amount of land.

Mr. RAKER. I think the Secretary of the Interior should fix the price for it. The people of California are perfectly willing to let the Secretary of the Interior fix the royalty.

Mr. MONDELL. They must be very liberal folks out there.

Mr. RAKER. Well, when you get squeezed you have to be liberal.

Mr. MONDELL. When you are squeezed by a decision of the department and want to get out you are willing to take anything. Is that the idea?

Mr. RAKER. Well, let us pay the Government something.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. We have discussed the bill seven or eight times and wasted too much time.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 7967. An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system; and

H. R. 1657. An act providing for second homestead and desert-land entries.

ALCATRAZ ISLAND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9017) transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, in regard to this bill there are some matters to be adjusted, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC-BUILDING SITE, PLYMOUTH, MASS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 16829, to provide for enlarging the site for the United States building at Plymouth, Mass.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise all the land in the old William Brewster plat still owned by private parties and contiguous to the public-building site now owned by the United States at Plymouth, Mass., and that the total cost of such extension and improvement shall not exceed the sum of $12,000: Provided, That if the land described shall be obtained for less than the amount authorized, the remainder may be used by the Secretary of the Treasury in grading and otherwise improving the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts one or two questions. Two years ago we passed a bill which, I think, the gentleman from Massachusetts introduced——

Mr. THACHER. I did not have the honor to be in the House at that time.

Mr. MANN. That was a loss to the House, whoever the gentleman succeeded. We passed a bill authorizing the sale of the Federal post-office site, or a portion of it, at Plymouth for $100. I believe the sale was not consummated, although the law was passed. I have a plat which has been furnished to me by the Treasury Department purporting to give the boundaries of the land which we authorized to be sold for $100, and the land which this bill proposes to acquire for $12,000. Now, gentlemen can see the amount of land that was to be sold for $100, and without widening my fingers much on this plat, this much is to be acquired for $12,000. There is little difference in the areas. It looks like a marked difference in the values of the land.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. If the committee had had filed a copy of that plat with the report, all the Members of the House could have seen it, and there would have been no question but that the facts would have been plain.

Mr. MANN. They could not have filed this plat, for they did not have it, and I do not think they had any other. They did not even know that we had authorized the sale two years ago. The committee did not discover that fact, apparently.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman says the sale was made two years ago?

Mr. MANN. We passed the law two years ago in May authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell a piece of this site for $100, on the ground that we did not need it. I am informed by the Treasury Department that the sale was not consummated, for the grantee refused to take it. Now we are asked to pay $12,000 for the piece of land adjoining the other, substantially no larger, on the ground that the site is not large enough. I am asking for information.

Mr. FOSTER. It looks to me as though the people of Plymouth were very enterprising.

Mr. MANN. Nobody ever accused the New England people of not being bright.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Speaker, I will be frank with the gentlemen. I do not recall the vote by which the sale of the land was authorized for $100.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. THACHER. I was not in the House at the time, and I do not know what land the gentleman refers to.

Mr. MANN. I could not tell from the description of the land in the law as to what land was referred to, and hence I wrote the Treasury Department this letter:

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

SIR: There is pending in the House H. R. 16829, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase lands or rights contiguous to the public-building site now owned at Plymouth, Mass. By the act of May 27, 1912, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to sell to the First Baptist Church of Plymouth that portion of the Burns lot included in the Federal building site in said city to the south of the continuation of the southerly boundary line of the next adjacent property conveyed to the United States by said First Baptist Church. I beg to ask whether the property so sold was a part of the present building site at Plymouth, which it is proposed by H. R. 16829 to now enlarge; and if so, to ask, if you can conveniently do so, that you may send me a rough pencil draft of the site, showing the land sold and the land proposed to be purchased.

Yours, very respectfully, ——— ———.

I received this letter from a very estimable gentleman, formerly a colleague of ours, whom we all love and admire, Mr. Andrew J. Peters, now Assistant Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 29, 1914.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 24th instant, I inclose a blue print showing the Federal building site at Plymouth, Mass. The land embraced within the yellow lines is the portion of the site which was proposed to be sold to the First Baptist Church of Plymouth pursuant to the act of Congress approved May 27, 1912. The sale, however, was never made, the Baptist Church people finally deciding that they did not desire to acquire the land.

The land embraced within the red lines is the property which is the subject of bill H. R. 16829, to which you refer. As will be seen, it is not a part of the land which was proposed to be sold by the act of May 27, 1912, hereinabove referred to.

Respectfully,
A. J. PETERS,
Assistant Secretary.

I have here in my hand the plat, with the red and the yellow lines. The yellow lines inclose a space not quite so large as the red lines, the two pieces adjoining, the red-line space being on the street, apparently, and the yellow line back. One we offered to sell for $100, and the other it is proposed that we pay $12,000 to buy, although I have been informed, and I will ask the gentleman whether that is correct, that the assessed valuation of this twelve-thousand piece in Plymouth is less than $2,000?

Mr. THACHER. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I believe that he is mistaken about the valuation. I shall be very glad to give him the information. There has been no inflation in the value of that land. The corner which the Government now owns is on the corner of Main and Leyden Streets, and it is proposed to acquire adjacent land on the northerly side of Main Street, which piece of property was sold about a year and a half ago for $7,000, and I understand that it has recently been sold for $9,000, and there is no hocus-pocus about this matter at all. The values are there and the property has been enhanced very materially. As I stated before, I think the Government made a mistake when they did not acquire all of the land, and I think if the gentleman would go to Plymouth—and I hope to have the honor of seeing him there some day—he would vote for this proposition.

Mr. MANN. But if the House two years ago voted for a bill authorizing the sale of a considerable portion of this land, upon the ground that we did not need it, what emergency has arisen since then which compels us not only to use the land that we have already gotten, but also the land that we agreed to sell, and a large amount in addition to that?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit an interruption?

Mr. THACHER. Yes.

Mr. BOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to have this bill go over without prejudice. The reason I make that suggestion is that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is interested in having some further information in respect to this, and unless he desires to make the request I shall make it myself.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COAST GUARD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2337) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HAY (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. HAY. I reserve the objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I will not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland objects and sticks to it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Fairchild	Kless, Pa.	Ragsdale

The SPEAKER. On this call 297 Members—a quorum—have responded to their names.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

BRIDGE ACROSS PISTAKEE AND NIPPERSINK LAKES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17267) to authorize Frank A. Gardiner to construct a bridge across the waters of Pistakee Lake and Nippersink Lake at or near their point of intersection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Frank A. Gardiner and his assigns be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the waters of Piskatee Lake and Nippersink Lake at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near their point of intersection, in the county of Lake, in the State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this bill authorizes the construction of a bridge over an exclusively interior lake. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee wherein is there any jurisdiction in the National Government to authorize such construction?

Mr. MANN. Oh, this is navigable water.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are plenty of interior lakes in Wisconsin which are navigable and which are not subject to the jurisdiction of the National Goverument because they are navigable.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] to make such explanation as he desires about the bill.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is navigable water, and it is an interstate stream, which connects with rivers that go up in the State of Wisconsin, and it is necessary to have the approval of the Federal Government to have such a bill as this passed in order that this bridge may be built.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain wherein the National Government has any authority over the waters of this lake?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Why, the waters of this lake are connected up with streams that are interstate in character.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, the United States Government has jurisdiction over all navigable waters. There is a provision in the river and harbor act of 1899 which dispenses with the necessity of coming to Congress with a special bill, but it does not prohibit the coming to Congress with a special bill at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman's contention to be that a lake exclusively within the confines of a State which has navigable waters gives jurisdiction to the National Government over those waters?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not understand it is necessary to answer that question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood just now that the gentleman made that as a postulate.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I said that where the stream is navigable within a State it is not absolutely necessary to come to Congress, but it is not prohibited, and I understand that this water is connected with other waters that are navigable.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can hardly conceive of any water in the United States, even though it may be a jerkwater stream, that is not in some way connected with navigable waters. This bridge proposes to go over navigable waters of a lake that is exclusively within the confines of a State. I never knew the National Government had jurisdiction over such waters, but I have no objection to this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The language of the river and harbor act of 1899, section 9, renders it unnecessary to come to Congress, but it does not prohibit the coming to Congress; and in this case the Secretary of War approved the project without even a suggestion that it is not necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is another bill reported from the gentleman's committee in which the Secretary of War states that he sees no reason whatsoever for the National Government taking jurisdiction even of a stream which is connected with navigable waters which are entirely within the confines of a State.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the Secretary of War says in the other case that he sees no actual necessity for it—not any reason for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, are amendments in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend to correct the spelling of the last word in the fifth line to conform with the spelling as printed in the title. It should be spelled P-i-s-t-a-k-e-e.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by changing the initial "A," in line 3, to the initial "H."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, change the initial "A" to the initial "H."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the title ought to be amended to correspond to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to correspond to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FOURTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON HOME EDUCATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11179) authorizing the Secretary of State to extend invitations to foreign countries to send delegates to the Fourth International Congress on Home Education.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a Senate bill exactly similar to this bill has passed the House and become a law. I ask that this bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to lay the bill on the table. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS BLACK RIVER, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17511) to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Great Western Land Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Black River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in the northwest quarter of section 5, township 22 north, range 7 east, of the fifth principal meridian, in the county of Butler, in the State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, after line 3, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17442) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1913, and June 6, 1914.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 103 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1913, and June 6, 1914, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 103. That the State of Pennsylvania is divided into three judicial districts, to be known as the eastern, middle, and western districts of Pennsylvania. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Berks, Bucks, Chester, Delaware, Lancaster, Lehigh, Montgomery, Northampton, Philadelphia, and Schuylkill. Terms of the district court shall be held at Philadelphia on the second Mondays in March and June, the third Monday in September, and the second Monday in December, each term to continue until the succeeding term begins. The middle district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Adams, Bradford, Cameron, Carbon, Center, Clinton, Columbia, Cumberland, Dauphin, Franklin, Fulton, Huntingdon, Juniata, Lackawanna, Lebanon, Luzerne, Lycoming, Mifflin, Monroe, Montour, Northumberland, Perry, Pike, Potter, Snyder, Sullivan, Susquehanna, Tioga, Union, Wayne, Wyoming, and York. Terms of the district court shall be held at Scranton on the second Monday in March and the third Monday in October; at Harrisburg on the first Mondays in May and December; at Sunbury on the second Monday in January; and at Williamsport on the first Monday in June. The clerk of the court for the middle district shall maintain an office, in charge of himself or a deputy, at Harrisburg; the civil suits instituted at that place shall be tried there, if either party resides nearest that place of holding court, unless by consent of parties they are removed to another place for trial. The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Allegheny, Armstrong, Beaver, Bedford, Blair, Butler, Cambria, Clarion, Clearfield, Crawford, Elk, Erie, Fayette, Forest, Greene, Indiana, Jefferson, Lawrence, McKean, Mercer, Somerset, Venango, Warren, Washington, and Westmoreland. Terms of the district court shall be held at Pittsburgh on the first Monday of May and the second Monday of November, and terms of the court shall be held at Erie on the third Monday of March and the third Monday of September. The clerk and marshal of said district shall have their principal offices at Pittsburgh, and shall maintain, by themselves or by their deputies, offices at Erie.

"The clerk shall place all cases in which the defendants reside in the counties of said district nearest Erie upon the trial list for trial at Erie, where the same shall be tried, unless the parties thereto stipulate that the same may be tried at Pittsburgh."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the purpose of this amendment is to tide over the meeting of the court in the city of Pittsburgh beyond election?

Mr. WEBB. That might be stated as correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I am not mistaken, the election is on the first Tuesday following the first Monday. If such is the case, is it not possible for the second Monday to occur on the day preceding the election?

Mr. WEBB. It might appear that way. It is very rare.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have a case in mind. Our primaries in Wisconsin are held on the first Tuesday in September. Usually Labor Day precedes. This year it just happens that the first Tuesday of September occurs to-day, and the primaries are being held. If it is the purpose to avoid the election difficulty, I would say the second Monday in November does not overcome that in all cases.

Mr. WEBB. In answer to that I can only say that the attorneys, the judge, and all the court officials are anxious that this change be made. It is purely a local matter, and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] represents this district and is anxious to have the bill pass, and the committee thought it best to grant the request.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill permits that it may happen on some rare occasion.

Mr. WEBB. It may in some rare instances, but it is very rare when it comes as late as the second Monday in November.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will not occur as frequently as the second Monday in November, but it will occur. To make it the second Wednesday would make it safe under all conditions.

Mr. WEBB. It is usual to provide Mondays.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IOWA INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. Res. 554, referring the bill (H. R. 17441) for the relief of the Iowa Indians of Oklahoma to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact and conclusions of law.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 16618) for the relief of the Iowa Indians of Oklahoma, with the accompanying papers, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact and conclusions of law, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

In line 1 strike out the figures "16618" and insert "17441."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the author of the bill whether it is his purpose to refer the bill H. R. 17441 to the Court of Claims or whether he wishes to refer the matters comprised in the bill to the Court of Claims?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. It is a bill for a finding of fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. The resolution reads that you wish to refer the bill H. R. 17441, with the accompanying papers, to the Court of Claims for finding of fact under the provisions of the general law. There is nothing for the Court of Claims to find out so far as that bill is concerned.

Mr. MANN. The law provides for that. It provides for referring the bill and provides for what the Court of Claims will find.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman wants the Court of Claims to find on the bill itself?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I want them to give a finding of fact under the general law on the matter comprised in the bill.

Mr. MANN. All we refer is the bill and accompanying papers. The law directs what the Court of Claims shall do.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether it is the purpose to give these people the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, as provided in text of the bill H. R. 17441?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is practically it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe it is not, from what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not. The court makes a finding of fact and reports back to Congress, just like it does on all these war claims we have.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman from Oklahoma was in error as to the purport of the provisions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LIMESTONE DEPOSITS, TUSCARORA NATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14196) authorizing the Tuscarora Nation of New York Indians to lease or sell the limestone deposits upon their reservation.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tuscarora Nation of New York Indians, by their chiefs in council assembled, are hereby authorized and empowered to lease or sell for the benefit of the nation all or a part of the limestone deposits upon their reservation in one or more suitable tracts: Provided, That before such lease or sale shall be made notice of intention to lease or sell, giving a general description of the lands upon which said limestone deposits are located, shall be published in two papers, one issued in the county of Niagara, State of New York, and one issued in the city of Buffalo, county of Erie, State of New York, once a week for three consecutive weeks; said notice shall state the time and place when sealed bids shall be received for the mentioned tracts, and such lease or sale shall be to the highest responsible bidder: Provided further, That before any lease or sale shall be made the terms of the proposed contract shall be fully explained to the entire nation and shall be approved by a majority of the votes of the whole people of voting age, but before any lease or sale shall become effective it shall be submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval as to the sufficiency of the amount of the consideration and terms of payment, and if approved by him, the chiefs are hereby authorized and empowered to enter into such lease or sale. All moneys paid upon any lease or sale made as herein provided shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall distribute the same among the adult persons, and thereafter to the minor persons as they attain their majority, entitled to participate in the distribution of the consideration, without any fee, expense, or charge against the nation or any of its people.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I have a committee amendment which I wish to present in the event that the bill is considered at this time. The amendment is in this language——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The amendment proposed by the committee is as follows:

At the end of line 19, page 2, add: "Provided further, That the money so deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the minors of said nation shall draw 3 per cent interest per annum; and the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, upon satisfactory proof, withdraw from the Treasury any part of the sum so deposited to the credit of any minor for the purpose of education or actual maintenance of said minor."

With this amendment we ask that the bill be enacted into law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I notice from the report that the value involved in this proposition is a million and a half dollars. Does the gentleman believe that we should pass under unanimous consent a bill involving such a large amount as that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We think, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the best guarded bills that has ever been brought before this House, for the reason that the Indians are of voting age, and they are voters in that State, as I understand it, and are required to pass upon this proposition by a referendum vote, which has to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. After the chiefs make the lease the Indians must pass upon that by a referendum vote, and the Secretary of the Interior must approve of that lease before it becomes active.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the position just stated by the gentleman from Texas, I wish to ask whether in the last Congress there was not a proposition before the House, or before the committee, which was far less favorable to the Indians and yet which had been approved by a majority of them?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not remember the exact terms of that bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that the Indians approved of a proposition to lease this property to the Carroll brothers on much less favorable terms than is expected to be?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield for an answer to that to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLANCY], who is more familiar with this matter than I am.

Mr. CLANCY. So far as I remember that bill, it was less favorable to the Indians, but I do not believe it was approved by the tribe, but only by the council. We require that the negotiations conducted by the council shall be approved by a referendum vote of the entire tribe.

Mr. STAFFORD. That referendum would be only of the majority of the tribe, would it not?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe there are only some four hundred and odd Indians remaining of the tribe?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes; I believe so.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are allottees, are they not?

Mr. CLANCY. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. They have not separated themselves from the tribal government?

Mr. CLANCY. No. Eleven chiefs are elected exclusively by the ballot of the squaws. The males have nothing to do with this business unless they are elected chiefs by the squaws.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have an illustration of where women are absolutely supreme, where the squaws elect the chiefs. That is an extremely interesting case of woman suffrage.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman does not compare the American women with the Indian squaws, does he?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I have not the full acquaintance with the Indian squaw that the gentleman from California may have, but I believe they stand very favorably as compared with the Indian men. I believe that there is not much difference between the Indian man and the Indian woman, and the Indian women have more burdens to bear than the Indian men.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I do not think the gentleman should compare the voting women of America with Indian squaws. We all are proud of the American woman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will admit that these Indian women in New York have been progressive enough to get the voting privilege long ahead of even the women of California, and they have not only gotten the voting privilege themselves, but they have already deprived the men of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Oh, that is all right.

Mr. MANN. If that is not progressive, then I do not know what is.

Mr. RAKER. The word "progressive" was used by the gentleman in a derisive way.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. Nobody used it in a derisive way except the gentleman from California, who is always deriding woman suffrage. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. If he is not deriding it, he is riding it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I may have added an extra syllable—that is all. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 19, page 2, add:

"Provided further, The money so deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the minors of said nation shall draw 3 per cent interest per annum; and the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, upon satisfactory proof, withdraw from the Treasury any part of the sum so deposited to the credit of any minor for the purpose of education or actual maintenance of said minor."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

HYDROGRAPHIC OFFICE AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 494) to establish a branch hydrographic office at Los Angeles, Cal.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIARY CODE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17147) to amend section 195 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill lie on the table, a similar Senate bill having passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the bill lie on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF SEA-FISHERY INDUSTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res 151) authorizing the President to accept the invitation to participate in an international exposition of sea-fishery industries.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of France to that of the United States to be represented by a delegate at an international exposition of sea fisheries, to be held at Boulogne-sur-Mer, June 15 to October 1, 1914: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the right to object.

Mr. MANN. When is this exposition to be really held?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Some time between June and October.

Mr. MANN. I see the joint resolution covers a period of time from June to October 1.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it going to be held at all?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think it is being held. The purpose of the administration was to appoint a delegate to this conference, who was already in Denmark to attend another conference, expecting him to devote a small part of his time to this duty.

The Secretary of State recommended the passage of this resolution in the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 4, 1914.

The PRESIDENT:

On February 25, 1914, the ambassador of the French Republic at this Capital, by order of his Government, extended to the Government of the United States an invitation to participate in an international exposition of sea-fishery industries to be held at Boulogne-sur-Mer from the 15th of June to the 1st of October of the present year, and to be officially represented therein by a delegate.

The Department of Commerce, to which this invitation was referred, has advised me that the exposition will doubtless contain features of great practical value to the United States, and that there should be a critical examination of the exhibits from the viewpoint of the American fishery interests, and has recommended that this Government take advantage of the presence of an official representative of this Government at the annual conference of the International Council for the Study of the Sea, to be held in Copenhagen, Denmark, in September next, for which provision has been made by Congress, and that this representative be made a delegate to the International Exposition of Sea Fishery Industries, with authority to devote a limited amount of time thereto. The Department of Commerce states that no special appropriation will be required for this purpose.

The Executive being precluded by a provision of the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, from accepting an invitation of this nature without specific authority of law, I have the honor to submit the matter herewith, to the end that should you approve thereof it may be transmitted to Congress for that body to determine whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation.

Respectfully submitted.

W. J. BRYAN.

Mr. MANN. Will he be able to attend now?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I could not answer that.

Mr. MANN. Anybody already in Europe has probably gotten out by this time, or is making great effort to get out.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think the delegate to the Copenhagen conference is in Europe.

Mr. MANN. He has my sympathy.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There is no war where this conference is being held, and it is possible he may be able to get to the exposition of sea fisheries in Paris.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LA JUNTA, COLO.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12665) to increase the limit of cost of public building at La Junta, Colo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at La Junta, Colo., be, and the same is hereby, increased $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the additional cost of construction of said building.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, there is no information contained in the report in this case.

Mr. KEATING. The situation is a very simple one. The last Congress appropriated $75,000 to construct a building at La Junta, Colo. The people of the city of La Junta donated a tract of land, valued at $20,000, as a site for this building. The Supervising Architect had plans prepared and bids called for. The lowest bid was $84,300, or $9,300 above the limit of cost. That would necessitate a recasting of the plans. The plans as made were very satisfactory to the Supervising Architect and to the people of this town; and, in view of the fact that the public-spirited citizens of La Junta had donated this tract of land, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury recommended an increase of $10,000 in the limit of cost.

Mr. MANN. Was this bill drawn in the Treasury Department?

Mr. KEATING. No, sir; I introduced the bill and took it to the Treasury Department.

Mr. MANN. Then I will call the attention of the gentleman to the form of his bill, which I think ought to be changed.

Mr. KEATING. I shall be very glad to accept such suggestions as the gentleman may offer. I am not an expert bill drafter.

Mr. MANN. It is not uncommon in making an appropriation to appropriate "$10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary," although that is not good form. But this is not an appropriation. The gentleman has used words which increase the limit of cost "$10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary." What the gentleman wants to do is to increase the limit of cost $10,000, and have that settled. So all after the words "ten thousand dollars" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman do me the favor to offer an amendment which will accomplish that result? I will deem it a favor if he will do so.

Mr. MANN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. KEATING. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the figures "$10,000."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out all after the words "ten thousand dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEATING, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGES, WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

The next two bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent were the bills (H. R. 17762) to amend an act approved February 20, 1908, entitled "An act to authorize the Interstate Transfer Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota," and (H. R. 15727) authorizing the county of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the next two bills on the calendar, H. R. 17762 and H. R. 15727, be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that these two bills be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POST-OFFICE SITE IN GASTONIA, N. C.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17764) to provide for sale of portion of post-office site in Gastonia, N. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell at public or private sale the following piece or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Gastonia, N. C., recently acquired by the Government of the United States for a public building, and more particularly described as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of the site and running south 40 minutes east 58 feet to an iron pipe marking a corner of the site; thence west 6 degrees 33 minutes south 35 feet to an iron pipe; thence north no degrees 25 minutes west about 58 feet to the northern boundary of the site; thence east 6 degrees north about 35 feet to the place of beginning. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to execute a quitclaim deed to the highest bidder for the foregoing piece of land, which shall transfer title from the United States to such purchaser.

SEC. 2. That the proceeds arising from the sale of the property described be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "public," strike out the words "or private," and, in the same line, after the word "sale," insert the words "for a consideration not less than $2,500."

Page 2, line 7, strike out the words "highest bidder for" and insert the words "purchaser of."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know why the Government wants to sell this property?

Mr. WEBB. The Government has no use for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Why did the Government purchase it?

Mr. WEBB. It was a part of a tract of land which belonged to a railroad, and the provisions of the transfer provided that if it ever ceased to be used for railroad property it should revert to the heirs of a man by the name of Davis. The whole site cost $14,500, which the people of Gastonia and I thought was high. Here is a little neck of land, 55 by 35 feet, that has been lying there for five years unused and can not be used by the Government, and, as you see by a letter from the Treasury Department, is not needed.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this property go back to the original owner?

Mr. WEBB. No; it has been condemned, and if we sell it the proceeds go into the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. What proportional part of the total area is to be sold?

Mr. WEBB. Very small; about one-seventh or one-eighth.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from North Carolina will yield, I will show my colleague a plat of the land.

Mr. WEBB. It is a little shoulder running out in the rear, not needed by the Government, and I as a public-spirited Representative think it ought to be sold. There is an upset price in the bill and the money will be turned into the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. Does anybody want to buy it?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know of but one person who has inquired about it. He is a barber, and I do not know whether he can pay the $2,500 or not.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose if he gets it he will get it by a close shave. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARK of Florida). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DONATING IRON FENCE TO DAUGHTERS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15575) donating the old iron fence around Vance Park, Charlotte, N. C., to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter, to be placed around Craighead Cemetery, near Sugar Creek Church, in Mecklenburg County.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the old iron fence around Vance Park, in the city of Charlotte, N. C., now being removed in the construction of a United States post-office and courthouse building, is hereby donated to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, Charlotte, N. C., for the purpose of being placed around the historic Revolutionary Craighead Cemetery, near Sugar Creek Church, in Mecklenburg County.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIS. Reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire if the bill has the unqualified approval of the Treasury Department?

Mr. WEBB. I think I can answer the gentleman's question in the affirmative, as he will see by looking at a letter printed in the report from Secretary McAdoo.

Mr. WILLIS. That is exactly what I have been looking at, and I invite the attention of the gentleman to the letter. It says in the letter from the Treasury Department, at the top of page 2 in the report:

Attention is invited to the fact that the contract for the construction of the proposed extension to the present post-office and courthouse building has not yet been awarded, and work on the same has therefore not been started.

It says in the bill, "now being removed in the construction of the United States post-office and courthouse building."

It appears that the contract has not yet been let as stated in the bill. The bill and the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury are not in harmony.

Mr. WEBB. I can say that the post-office building is now in existence there on the site on which the new building will be erected, and also the assay office, about which the gentleman has heard something during his service here, are on the same lot; that an appropriation has been made for remodeling the assay office, and this iron fence is around the assay-office lot, and not around the post-office building. A large portion of the fence has already been removed in order to make improvements on the assay office, which will house post-office officials while the new building is being constructed.

Mr. WILLIS. But the improvement on the building has not yet been started.

Mr. WEBB. Not on the post-office building.

Mr. WILLIS. It says that the contract has not yet been awarded. But this is the more important matter, concerning which I wish to inquire: Is there anything in the bill guaranteeing the Government against any expense?

Mr. WEBB. There is nothing in the bill that imposes any expense on the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. I call attention to the recommendation of the Treasury Department in the last paragraph of the letter:

The department will interpose no objection to the legislation proposed by this bill, provided all repairs incident to the removal of the fence be made, and the grounds left in good condition, and that this work be done without expense to the Government.

The Secretary says that this removal should be made without any expense whatever to the Government.

That is not provided for in the bill, and consequently it does not meet with the recommendation of the Secretary.

Mr. WEBB. The committee considered that point, and they were of the opinion that the bill does not authorize any expense on the part of the Government, and therefore nobody would be allowed to incur any expense on the part of the Government. A portion of the fence has already been removed, and is going to rust and decay. There is nothing to do but to haul it out in the country and set it up around the Craighill Cemetery.

Mr. WILLIS. I am in hearty sympathy with the patriotic purpose of the bill, and I have no objection to taking the fence away if there will be no expense incurred on the part of the Government. The ground will not be left in good condition, and that expense will fall on the Government.

Mr. WEBB. I can assure the gentleman that unless the patriotic women who ask for the fence—the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence Chapter—are willing to incur the expense it will not be taken away at Government expense.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman object to an amendment providing that the work shall be done without expense to the Government? If such an amendment would be acceptable, I should withdraw all objection to the bill as I think its object is patriotic and proper.

Mr. WEBB. No; that was suggested in the committee, but it was not thought necessary.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for an amendment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. An amendment providing that without expense to the United States the ground shall be left in good condition upon the removal of the fence, including any proper and incidental repairs?

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection, because that is exactly what the Daughters of the American Revolution propose to do.

Mr. WILLIS. In view of the gentleman's statement, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

"Provided, That without expense to the United States the ground shall be left in good condition upon the removal of the fence, including any proper and incidental repairs."

Mr. WEBB. I want to say to my friend from Illinois that the Government will have to remove the fence in order to build the building.

Mr. MANN. That would not impose any additional expense on the Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CRATER BATTLE FIELD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13923) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to appoint a commission to designate, define, and survey the battle field of the Crater at Petersburg, Va., and to collect certain data concerning the same, and make report thereupon.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission consisting of three Army officers, or as many thereof as may be necessary, to survey, ascertain, and define the battle field near Petersburg, Va., known as the Crater farm, where the memorable engagement between the Federal and Confederate Armies occurred on July 30, 1864.

SEC. 2. That the said commission shall report upon the advisability and feasibility of the acquirement by the United States Government of the land on which this battle was fought, consisting of about 100 acres, for the purpose of preserving the same as a memorial of the war, a suitable site for the erection of monuments, and as a professional study for the military student; and in this connection said commission is authorized to ascertain and report what would be the probable cost of acquiring this property and the preservation of it as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the purposes of this act and to defray any expenses incurred by the commission in the performance of the duties hereby directed the sum of $1,000, or such portion thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the authority of the Secretary of War.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to inquire into and report to Congress upon the advisability and practicability of purchasing the land near Petersburg, Va., containing 100 acres, more or less, known as the Crater farm, and preserving the same as a suitable memorial of the Civil War, a site for the erection of monuments, a professional study for the military student, and other public uses."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to inquire into and make report upon the advisability and practicability of purchasing the Crater farm, near Petersburg, Va."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WATSON] that he will have to give very good reasons for asking us to pass by unanimous consent any proposition designed to purchase a battle field. We have had so many of these matters up since I have been in the House that I do not know where we will stop when we begin to consider them favorably. I tried for a long time myself to get the Congress to buy Appomattox field, but nay, nay; and I guess those who objected to it were right.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the motive underlying this proposition comes from the frequently expressed desires of the soldiers of the late Federal armies who were associated with this locality during the last year of the war. Many of the Grand Army of the Republic camps in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts have passed resolutions asking that steps be taken to secure this property, so that they may erect thereupon suitable monuments, and for other purposes, to commemorate their services at that period of the war. The land especially in contemplation embraces about 90 acres. It happens to be in the possession of the same family who owned it 50 years ago. The family contemplates a removal, and thus the property for the first time is available for purchase. These gentlemen from the North, who have already erected a considerable number of monuments in that locality, have been put to the necessity of acquiring private property for that purpose. In some instances these monuments have been practically buried in the woods. It is considered by the people interested in the proposition—and they are chiefly soldiers of the late Federal and Confederate Armies—that a suitable memorial site whereupon their monuments could be erected would be a most desirable acquisition.

I doubt, Mr. Speaker, if a proposition of this character has ever before been presented to Congress so entirely free of selfish and commercial aims, and resting as this one does altogether upon grounds of sentiment and public utility. This farm lies perhaps one-half mile from the corporate limits of the city of Petersburg. I have every reason to suppose that it can be acquired for a reasonable price, and when I say a reasonable price, I do not mean a price that would sound large even to the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it would be within historical limits to say that, perhaps, this spot which it is sought to have the Government acquire is associated in the personal recollection of more soldiers of both sides in the late Civil War than any other spot on the Continent of America. I think it would be fair to say that in the neighborhood of 300,000 soldiers had direct personal association with this particular locality during the last year of the war. The Crater happens to have been the site of a very unique and spectacular engagement which occurred during the war, in many respects the most unique of the entire struggle. I do not believe that a single spot on the American Continent is personally remembered by so many soldiers as the battle field of the Crater. These are, of course, only sentimental considerations. The bill does not require that the Government acquire anything. It does not carry the appropriation of a cent of public money.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the gentleman's estimate of the cost, should we desire to acquire this, for the purposes mentioned, which I think are very praiseworthy.

Mr. WATSON. My information is that the whole property, which would include the battle field of over 90 acres and an adjoining 10 acres containing interesting breastworks of the contending armies, could be acquired inside of $30,000, the whole within a mile of the corporate limits of Petersburg. The bill does not propose to pay anybody anything or appropriate a dollar of public money at this time. It simply provides that the Secretary of War shall investigate and report to Congress the exact data and information which the gentleman from New York asks for. I can not see that any harm could come from the passage of the bill, and I sincerely hope that the gentleman will allow it to pass without objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many of these propositions all of the time. The Government is engaged in giving away property which it owns, and gentlemen are always seeking to have it buy property which somebody else owns, and they usually make out a possible case, and perhaps often it ought to be done. But it is impossible for the Government to own all of the battle fields, improve them, and take care of them, and in recent years the Congress has not done so. Perhaps we have been too careful about it, but we own a number of very handsome and very creditable battle fields. We would not want to own simply 90 acres. Ninety acres would be just the beginning. If we owned a hundred acres there, we would soon own 1,000 acres and more, and we would need to do that.

Mr. WATSON. I will state to the gentleman that it would be impossible for him to get a thousand acres at this particular site, as these hundred acres embrace all the available and suitable area for the purpose named in the bill in that particular locality.

Mr. MANN. In any other direction but one—it is not important; it does not make any difference. At Gettysburg we take in the town of Gettysburg and everything around it.

Mr. WATSON. I will say that there is nothing which requires the Government to buy 90 acres or 10 acres or any number of acres. This bill simply directs an investigation and report.

Mr. MANN. I understand there is nothing to require the Government to buy it as yet, but it is much easier to stop these things at the beginning than it is to wait until they become of great force. Of course I have great respect for the Confederate camps and the Grand Army of the Republic camps, but one man can start the ball rolling and get resolutions passed by 100 or 50 of them without wasting anything more than that many 2-cent postage stamps.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Although probably they look at it from that point of view. I have no criticism of them for it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me to tell him——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. That this proposition may be said to have originated among ex-Union soldiers in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. It did not originate at Petersburg, although it has the cordial support of all its people.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the beginning of nearly every proposition of this kind is that some one person fairly well informed, half asleep on Sunday morning in church, not listening to the sermon, happens to think it is a brilliant idea and starts it in action and it just rolls along. Nobody else gives it much consideration. They just adopt it because that is the easiest way to do; but when people offer to pay money themselves for something, they think about it. It does not take a very generous man anywhere in the world to ask his neighbor to treat his neighbor's children well and give them a good education, fine clothes, and everything else of the sort. Generosity comes when you offer to do it yourself, and everywhere people are quite willing to have any expense borne by the National Treasury because they delude themselves with the notion that we make money by printing it, and it does not cost anybody anything.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield for one question? I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he knows how many States have erected monuments in this vicinity or are proposing so to do? How many have already erected monuments?

Mr. WATSON. One State has erected a monument there upon this property by the owner's consent.

Mr. WILLIS. What State?

Mr. WATSON. It is the State of Massachusetts, I think. The State of Pennsylvania has erected a monument there close by, but not upon the property. In all I think there are three monuments to ex-Union soldiers in close proximity to the tract of land in question.

Mr. WILLIS. How large an area is covered by this famous crater? I never had an opportunity of visiting this historic battle field.

Mr. WATSON. The farm which embraces the breastworks which were involved in this particular engagement and the mine which was sunk comprises about 90 acres of land. The whole tract has been preserved intact and is now occupied by the same family who owned it 50 years ago.

Mr. WILLIS. Personally I am in favor of this bill. Because of the unique features connected with this battle ground, does the gentleman think it likely that there will be requests for purchase at other places in this vicinity than at this particular point? If this is to be the only site to be purchased in all this great historic battle field, it seems to me that fact is an argument in favor of this bill.

Mr. WATSON. I can say to the gentleman that the territory embraced within this area comprises everything within the present contemplation of those interested in this project.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman know whether any of this Crater farm has been purchased by any State or by any organization for the purpose of using it as a cemetery or a place for erecting monuments?

Mr. WATSON. The monument which is already located on the land was located by the consent of the owner. There was no purchase price paid. On the contiguous plantation, where two other monuments have been erected, I think by Pennsylvania organizations, the site, I think, was purchased in one case and donated in the other.

Mr. NORTON. Has the city of Petersburg or the State of Virginia been interested sufficiently in this Crater farm at any time to purchase any part of it?

Mr. WATSON. What does the gentleman mean by acquiring title to any part? I do not think a foot of it has been owned by anyone except the original owners, who have held it since the war.

Mr. NORTON. There has been no movement in Virginia by its citizens to purchase the Crater farm?

Mr. WATSON. It has not been offered for sale until within the last six months.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. FRANCIS RIVER, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17825) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the St. Francis River at or near St. Francis, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Clay, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Arkansas, and the county of Dunklin, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Missouri, their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Francis River, at or near St. Francis, Ark., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STEADYING THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 311.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) instructing American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture to present to the permanent committee for action at the general assembly in 1915 certain resolutions.

Resolved, etc., That in accordance with the authority of letter (f) of article 9 of the treaty establishing the institute, which provides that it shall "submit to the approval of the Governments, if there be need, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers," the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture is hereby instructed to present (during the 1914 fall sessions) to the permanent committee the following resolutions, to the end that they may be submitted for action at the general assembly in 1915, so as to permit the proposed conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917:

"RESOLUTIONS.

"The general assembly instructs the International Institute of Agriculture to invite the adhering Governments to participate in an international conference on the subject of steadying the world's price of the staples.

"This conference shall consist of members appointed by each of the Governments adhering to the institute, and is to consider the advisability of formulating a convention for the establishment of a permanent international commerce commission on merchant marine and on ocean freight rates with consultative, deliberative, and advisory powers.

"Said conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as tellers.

The House divided.

The SPEAKER. The tellers report that on this vote the ayes are 73 and noes none. So a second is ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think there ought to be more than 73 Members in the House. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is before the House.

Mr. GARNER. Was the House dividing on the question, so that there is no necessity for a call of the House? It seems to me it is an automatic call.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Speaker had not announced the result.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference about the result.

Mr. MANN. I did not make the point of no quorum in objecting to the second at all.

The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. MANN. I made a point of no quorum, but I had no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this vote 280 Members have responded—a quorum.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. A quorum is present, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for 20 minutes.

[Mr. FLOOD of Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the International Institute of Agriculture is a Government institution, having its seat permanently at Rome, Italy. It is supported by a treaty between 54 adhering Governments, including the United States.

The purpose of this resolution is to instruct the American delegate to that institute, Mr. David Lubin, to invite a conference of the adhering Governments to consider the question of creating finally an international commerce commission for the control of freight rates on the high seas. Hearings were had last year by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is chairman, and those hearings consist of four volumes, covering a voluminous report, showing that there is a great shipping trust in control of ocean freight rates. A similar report was made by the Royal Commission of England, consisting of two large volumes. Another report was made by the Canadian commission, consisting, I believe, of three volumes. All those reports show indubitably that there exists throughout the world a great shipping trust controlling ocean freight rates, and that these rates have increased from 100 to 200 per cent within the past two years.

It was shown in the hearings had before the Committee on Foreign Affairs that of the total freight carried overseas, excluding mail and passenger traffic, only two-ninths consist of package freight or articles of manufacture; that the other seven-ninths consist largely of agricultural products. The testimony adduced by these commissions, as well as by other investigators, reflects the further fact that upon all package traffic in manufactured articles the ship carrier is required to give from 30 to 60 days' notice of any change of freight for the purpose of making stable the freight rate. The evidence further shows that upon agricultural or staple products no notice at all is required, but that the carrier—the shipowner—arbitrarily changes his rates not only from day to day, but from hour to hour, thus making unstable all freight traffic upon the staples or agricultural products.

The grower of agricultural products receives so much for his products, less the cost of transportation.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I have only a few minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I understand that there is a bill coming in here appropriating $25,000,000 to enable the Government to buy ships and go into the shipping business itself. It will steady the freight rates when it does that, will it not?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Oh, the Government of the United States might spend $100,000,000, Mr. Speaker, in the purchase of ships, and then "Uncle Sam" would not control the shipping interests of the world. The ships that may be bought for this $25,000,000 would be but a small segment in the great circle of the world's commerce.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman will understand, whatever the rate is, that it will tend to steady the other rates and bring all to a level that we set with our $25,000,000 worth of ships?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. That $25,000,000 worth of ships bought by this Government would not steady rates, nor do I understand it would pretend to steady rates. I do not know whether the gentleman is opposed to this resolution or not.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I was asking a question. I am not indicating my position on the bill.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my time is quite limited, with due deference to my friend from Texas, I do not care to be further interrupted.

The world's price of the staples of agriculture is controlled at the point of export. This year's American crop of wheat will exceed possibly 900,000,000 bushels. It has been shown that if the cost of the transportation of wheat across the seas is but 1 cent per bushel, at that rate it would be $9,000,000. If it were 25 cents a bushel it would be $225,000,000. The evidence taken by the commissions, as well as by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as testified to by Mr. Lubin, the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, shows that from time to time bulk traffic, such as wheat and cotton, may be carried gratis for the reason that when a ship is under orders to sail, the ship must sail upon a certain day and upon a certain hour.

If that ship be lacking in ballast she must have ballast or else she will turn turtle. Therefore, a ship to-day may carry a cargo of wheat or of cotton without any charge whatever. As to cotton, it happens very infrequently, as compared to the number of cargoes of wheat that are carried gratis. Not that the shipowners are philanthropists or accustomed to giving alms to the shipper, but for the purpose of running out of business the independent steamers and ships that are not owned by the Shipping Trust.

If wheat is $1 per bushel in Liverpool, the quotation is made to all markets of the world that wheat is $1. If the price of carrying that wheat across the sea is 25 cents per bushel, the producer of that wheat receives not $1 for his wheat in New York or in Chicago or any other export point, but $1 less 25 cents. If the price of cotton, for instance, in Liverpool be 15 cents a pound, the producer of cotton will not receive 15 cents a pound for his cotton exported from New York, New Orleans, or Galveston, but he will receive so much less the cost of transportation, because the quotation mark means the price at the place of delivery, in Liverpool or in London. The great agricultural products of the world are not sold like package traffic, are not sold like boots and shoes, and typewriters, and other manufactured products. The great agricultural products of the world are sold upon the exchanges. They are sold in the pit, they are sold upon the bourse; and these prices are telegraphed, are megaphoned, so to speak, throughout all corners of the earth. They change from day to day, whereas the products of manufacture, not bulk traffic, but package traffic, are not thus sold. They are bartered and sold in private. The manufacturer sells to the jobber, and the jobber sells to the retail merchant.

The retail merchant sells to his customer, and the carriage price of shoes may change across the high seas, but if so, notice of from 30 to 60 days must be given whether the price is to be raised or lowered, for the reason that the manufacturer can not figure the cost of his goods with pencil and paper unless he knows the exact cost of transportation. But the producer of agricultural products has no knowledge to-day what the price of the carriage of his wheat, his corn, or his cotton may be to-morrow. Therefore he may say that whereas wheat is worth $1 to-day in Liverpool, and the cost of carriage to-day across the seas be 1 cent a bushel, to-morrow it may be also $1 per bushel in Liverpool, but the carriage across seas to-morrow may be 25 cents per bushel. So he is at last and finally at the mercy and subject to the whim and caprice and arbitrary will of the carrier—the shipowner. [Applause.]

Manufactured goods or package traffic and agricultural products or staples, as they are called, are never placed upon the same footing as regards the prices that the producer may finally receive, for the reason, as stated a moment ago, that whereas manufactured goods are sold in private by dealing with the individual, and the price does not necessarily become established, but may change with the next order or sale. But with agricultural products the rule is different. These products being sold upon the exchange, in the pit, or on the bourse, the prices quoted are made throughout the world, and every bushel of wheat and of corn and every bale of cotton is controlled by the quotation. Prices on manufactured goods, as well as freight traffic on same, are fairly stable and change but little from week to week or month to month, as one transaction does not necessarily affect hundreds of thousands of other transactions made at the same moment in all parts of the world, whereas quotations on agricultural products, changing from day to day or from hour to hour, are not only affected in all parts of the world alike, but are doubly affected by the instability and uncertainty of freight rates on same, which the evidence shows vary not only from day to day but from hour to hour.

The home market on agricultural products is affected not merely by the market quotation but by the transportation charge as well. So it happens that the merchant, the wholesaler, the manufacturer may figure with pencil and paper to a nicety, to a certainty the cost of his goods laid down, but the grower of agricultural products, not having a fixed charge, not knowing the value of his products from day to day or the cost of carriage on same, is unable to even approximate with pencil and paper the price he is to receive for the output of his toil. The broker or commission merchant who may handle the staples of agriculture, likewise uncertain as to the cost or carriage, discounts the price at the maximum charge in order to come out safe and whole, while the cost upon some of his transactions may be the minimum and not the maximum; so the grower of agricultural products is caught by the broker or the commission man when this happens to be the case. And when, perchance, the ship carrier transports a cargo of wheat, cotton, or corn without charge for transportation the man who grows these products is not benefited by this free transportation, and the world may be challenged to show that he is benefited thereby, for the reason that agricultural products being sold upon the exchange are bought by the foreign purchaser not from the man who grows the cotton or the corn, for he sells not direct to the foreign purchaser, but in the meantime these articles from the farm have changed hands once or twice and are bought from the elevator man, who may have millions of bushels of wheat stored away, or from the cotton factors or commission merchants, who may have many thousands of bales of cotton bought or become agents for cotton grown by the farmers, and if a cargo of cotton or wheat is occasionally carried across the seas without charge the buyer abroad in London, Liverpool, Berlin, or Paris does not deal directly with the producer of these products but with the man at the point of export—Galveston, New Orleans, New York. So, after all, I repeat, if occasionally a cargo of agricultural products be carried free of charge the producer of these products, the man whose labor and investments have been expended to bring them into the world, does not become the beneficiary of this occasional free transportation for the additional reason that the merchant or cotton factor or elevator man deducts from the farmer when the purchase is made, not the minimum, but the maximum charge for transportation. Therefore the growers of agricultural products should be placed and desire to be placed in the same condition as his neighbor, the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the commission man, or the merchant, as regards stability of transportation over the seas.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the object of this resolution, which I have the honor to report favorably from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has for its ultimate aim, through certain channels, the processes to be initiated by the International Institute of Agriculture, the creation finally of an international commerce commission for the stabilizing of ocean freight, as set forth in resolution No. 311

It is strange, indeed, Mr. Speaker, that the great agricultural interests of the country have not been aroused to the importance of this question and the seeming lack of knowledge of the discrimination and injustice dealt to them in the way of ocean freight rates, but they are just now becoming aware of the importance of this question, and if the agricultural people in the great countries of the world demand, as they should, their rights to see that they are placed upon the same footing as the manufacturers and those who deal in package traffic, the consummation of this idea, which is the dream of Mr. Lubin, the father of the International Institute of Agriculture, will be realized.

How, it may be asked, has this discrimination between the manufacturer on the one hand and the agricultural producer on the other been brought about? Why, sir, does the ship carrier give from 30 to 60 days' notice of a change in freight rates to the manufacturer or importer of package traffic, thus stabilizing his freights, which are but two-ninths of the over-sea traffic, but arbitrarily, and without warning or notice, changes the ocean rates, not only daily, but hourly if necessary, on agricultural or staple products, which amount to seven-ninths of ocean traffic, excluding mail and passengers? I will tell you why. The manufacturers and importers are powerful men financially. They are well organized, are within easy touch and communication, reside in cities and other centers of population, their aggregate wealth and influence being beyond the realm of approximation, and if ocean freight rates were not stable on package traffic and if the carrier should change his freight rates arbitrarily on such traffic, as he does upon the staples of agriculture, a great howl would go up—yea, the tumult would be thunderous, and the ship carriers would be bombarded by this organized craft of business men until the ship carrier would be forced to meet their demands, the very order that obtains to-day, which brings stability in ocean freights on package traffic.

But the farmers are not thus organized. They have not the same means of business intercourse or intercommunication. Scattered here and there, unorganized, disorganized, they sell that which they produce not in concert but individually and at random. But they are waking up, as was evidenced by the appearance before our committee of Mr. William T. Creasy, master of the Pennsylvania State Grange, and Mr. George P. Hampton, the representative in Washington of the State granges of eight of the large agricultural States. This proposition is also highly indorsed by Mr. H. S. Mobley, president of the Farmers' Union of Arkansas, who was in Washington for 10 days recently. This Government is confronted with many great problems—yea, too numerous to mention. Some of these may be shown by the demands and platforms of political conventions. I do not underrate the importance of many of these, but the supreme question of the hour—the vital question that goes to the heart and the home of every producer whose individual toil enters into the price of his output—is the justice, the equity of exchange, and none so much as the equity in the exchange of agricultural products.

Let us break the chains that manacle the arms and shackle the feet of those who feed and clothe the world.

I desire at this point, Mr. Speaker, to quote from the testimony of Mr. Lubin, before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the following:

Mr. LUBIN. Of course, if there is no truth in the statements set forth here—if there is no truth in the four volumes of the report gotten up by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries—if there is no truth in the statements gotten up by the British Board, by the royal commission, then of course there is nothing before this committee, and we ought to adjourn. We would then be wasting time. But if there is truth in the statements set forth, then there can be no objection to a deliberative, consultative, and advisory body. And it should be a permanent organization, of course. Otherwise a mere conference would do no more good than the conference held here if it adjourned to-morrow and did nothing. But a permanent body framed like that of the International Institute of Agriculture, with delegates who would have special knowledge of the subject, delegates consisting of members of the different countries of the world together with the representatives of the shipowners, by holding public hearings, would reach the people everywhere, and we would soon know the equities in the case, and what ought to be done, and so forth.

The question before us is not unimportant. I doubt whether the war that is being carried on to-day by all the great European powers is of any more importance than the question before us. But it is an obscure one. If it had not been so obscure it would have been put before the people long ago. Civilization is not asleep—that which goes to make civilization. We have evidence of that in this watch [showing watch]. Some of the best minds of the world have been at work and have made us the watch. It was not long ago that the King of England had a candle with stripes around it, red, brown, blue, etc., and when it burned down to such a mark it was such o'clock. That was the clock, and we have worked from the painted candle up to the watch. And from the remarkable blanke of the Indian we have come to the Jacquard loom These things, of course, we need not talk of here. We know of the wonders, the Godlike wonders, in the power of development of man.

But when we come to the chief of all things, the primary things, the first things, the domain of exchange between man and man, the alpha of human ken seems to be awfully clumsy, not much nearer to the true line than the clumsy Indian. It is strange, but it is a fact.

We find in the domain of exchange—and, by the way, if the Bible teaches anything it teaches equity in exchange. It does not teach, as some would have it, that religion means a little lady or gentleman floating around in the sky with mosquito-bar clothes on. The old prophets never spoke of any such thing as that; Jesus never spoke of any such thing as that. That is idolatry. What they spoke about was equity here in exchange, that is all. And we have missed that and have gone off to idolatry and we haven't got equity in exchange at all. How curious it is that members of our chambers of commerce will work tooth and nail with all their power in the interest of trade on the importation and exportation of neckties and boot blacking and clothing and skirts and typewriters. But where are their efforts of equity in exchange, so far as the food products of the people are concerned, the food that must go to feed this Nation, and more yet, the great family of 1,800,000,000 people—the men, women, and children of the world? The equities in the exchange of these products are in such primitive shape that we could not excuse ourselves if an intelligent man from Mars came down here to-day and said, "Gentlemen, show me an example of your civilization." And the very first thing he would touch upon would be the equities in the exchange of the staples—the food products of the people and the raw material for their clothes. The very first thing he would touch upon would be the exchange of these things, and he would find it crude, clumsy, wasteful, and unjust. Our Jacquard looms, our electric lights, our science, our philosophy, and our religion would be waived aside for the moment, and he would consider the weightier questions—the equities in the exchange of the food products. This would be the scale that he would weigh us in, and in this scale would we not be found wanting?

Bring before your committee the presidents of the chambers of commerce and of your boards of trade, and the masters of economics, and ask them to defend the present system in the exchange of the staples—the food products of the people of the world and the raw material for their clothes. Ask them whether there is equity in this exchange. And what will be their answer? They could not say yes, unless they lied. And yet what are the chambers of commerce for? How have they spoken in the four volumes published here by your committee? They have not touched upon the equities of this question at all that I can see. And are they not censurable for this neglect of what is clearly the duty of a chamber of commerce and of an economist?

Now, let us get to the whole proposition, because we have not time for an extended speech.

With the power of mind and judgment and skill as shown in these four volumes of your committee, the work of the chambers of commerce, the work of our economists, we should know the laws governing the equities in exchange. And in what direction do they lead us? This, that the fellow that exports neckties and typewriters and shoe blacking, to him is given their whole power and energy, whatever power they possess. This goes into giving these people the equity. What about the equities in exchange of the staples of agriculture? We see that shoe blacking and typewriters, shirts and hats, have fixed rates for ocean carriage, with 30 or 60 days' notice of change from their fixed rates. But the staples of agriculture have no fixed rates whatever. Their rates are fixed from "day to day or hour to hour."

I desire to quote further from Mr. Lubin, whose great mind conceived not only the importance of establishing an international institute of agriculture but for the final deliverance from bondage of the great masses of the people who by their toil feed and clothe the world. When the names of many men now in public life shall have been forgotten, that of Mr. David Lubin will be remembered in the hearts of men of all time for his unselfish and altruistic work in behalf of that class of people who have not been in the minds of most men who legislate in the parliaments of earth. Speaking of the discrimination between those who toil and are not remembered and those who speculate upon the labors of their fellows who toil, Mr. Lubin has this to say:

From the facts elicited at these inquiries it would seem as though there are "godfathers," so to speak, on the lookout for all the interests involved, excepting for those of the staples. There is a godfather for iron, the Steel Trust; a godfather for agricultural implements, the Harvester Trust; a godfather for oils, the Standard Oil Trust; there is a godfather for the carriers, the shipping rings; a godfather for the commission men and the dealers handling the "package traffic," the chamber of commerce and the board of trade; but there is no godfather for the staples of agriculture, no godfather to represent the interests of the producer and of the consumer.

But the question arises: Would it have made any practical difference to the outcome if the interests of the producer and of the consumer had been represented at these inquiries? Let us see.

It seems to me that no matter how competent the testimony offered by a body representing the farmers or the consumers, no matter how honest the committee before which such testimony would be given, no matter how able the proposals for legislation which that committee might draft, it would all be ineffective unless the evidence given indicated the international bearing of the subject and unless the findings deduced therefrom recommended action on international lines. So long as the findings would fail to recommend international action they must necessarily fall short of applying adequate means to the ends in view. That this is worthy of serious consideration will be apparent from the following:

In the case of "package traffic" the terms and conditions of ocean carriage mainly concern the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer. In the case of "bulk traffic" the traffice in the staples of agriculture, the terms and conditions of ocean carriage, concern the economic welfare of the people everywhere.

To illustrate: Under "package traffic," whether the rate on shipments of shoes or cutlery, for instance, be too low or too high, whether it be fixed or whether it fluctuate, whether the conditions be advantageous or disadvantageous, affects the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer.

But with "bulk traffic" the case is different. In the carriage of the staples of agriculture, whether the rate be too low or too high, whether it be fixed or whether it fluctuate, whether the conditions be advantageous or disadvantageous, concerns not merely the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer, but it concerns the economic condition of the people everywhere, as will be shown further on.

At this time it would be well to bear in mind that while, on the one hand, "package traffic" comprises that class of merchandise which is bought and sold by private purchase and sale, by private contract, "bulk traffic," on the other hand, comprises, in the main, the staples of agriculture which are bought and sold in the world's bourses and exchanges at the world's price.

And what do we mean when we say the "world's price?"

We mean the price that is tendered and accepted in the world's bourses and exchanges, which we might call the world's auction rooms.

And how is this price arrived at?

The first factor in arriving at the world's price is the prevailing opinion as to the state of the world's supply. If the supply be above the normal, the price is expected to fall below the normal; if the supply be below the normal, the price is expected to rise above the normal.

By "supply" we do not mean the quantity produced or available in any one locality, in any one country; we mean the total world's supply. The supply in any given State may be above the normal, and yet if, at the same time, it be below the normal for the world, the price in that State should, nevertheless, be high. Or, vice versa, the supply in a given State may be below the normal, yet if the world's supply be above the normal the price in that State should be low.

But the supply is by no means the only factor in the formation of the world's price. There is another factor, and an important one, the cost of ocean carriage. If the average cost of ocean carriage be above the normal, it should correspondingly reduce the price paid to the producer below the normal. And, on the contrary, if the average cost of ocean carriage be below the normal it should correspondingly raise the price paid to the producer above the normal.

Therefore, calculations on rational lines for arriving at a knowledge of what the world's price ought to be should, first of all, take into consideration the status of the world's supply, and, secondly, the status of the cost of ocean carriage.

If there were fixed rates for ocean carriage of the staples, the Liverpool buyer would be able to make offers for given quantities of wheat, for instance, on a basis of rational calculations. But let us take the case as it stands at present. A shipper at Buenos Aires receives an order for wheat to be delivered in Liverpool at the ruling world's price, at, say, $1 a bushel; how much should he pay for that wheat at Buenos Aires? If the cost of delivery is, say, 10 cents a bushel, the world's price should then be 90 cents a bushel in Buenos Aires. If the cost of delivery is 30 cents, the world's price in Buenos Aires should then be 70 cents. But if he is to ship the wheat in 30 or 60 days' time, how is the shipper to tell what the cost of carriage will then be? As the rates for the ocean carriage of the staples are not fixed, how is he to know? He does not know.

As we have seen, the Chamber of Commerce of New York states that wheat is carried at one time free of charge as ballast and at another time at a charge of 10d. and 12d. per bushel; and the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce writes that "rates fluctuate from day to day, and a rate reported to-day might be twice as high or half as low to-morrow." Therefore, the shipper must guess, and so must everyone else guess, so long as rates are unfixed. If the shipper wins on the guess, what he wins comes directly out of the pocket of the producer; if he loses, he tries hard to recoup himself in his next deal, and also out of the producer's pocket.

But this is only the beginning of the mischief. The confusion arising out of the system of unfixed rates for ocean carriage of the staples and the consequent uncertainty in price determining lead to economic evils so far-reaching as to affect the people everywhere.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I favor this resolution. The International Institute of Agriculture has already accomplished a splendid purpose. Prior to the time it was organized it was practically impossible to get accurate crop reports of the world from authentic sources. Speculators who wanted to manipulate the markets of the world had agents in different agricultural countries, and these speculators could give out any reports they desired in order to show either an excess of production or a shortage of production of any or all of the great staples of agriculture. There were many people who looked upon the formation of the institute with more or less misgiving; but since it has been founded 54 nations of the world have subscribed to the protocol under which it was organized; and to-day each one of these countries sends official reports every month to Rome, where the headquarters of the institute are located. These reports in turn are sent to every country on earth, and, as a result, the producers and consumers throughout the world know to-day what the authentic crop reports of practically every civilized nation may be.

Now, the question of ocean carriage has much to do with fixing the price of many of these staples that the whole world consumes. At the present time the ocean-carrying freight varies on the staples of agriculture practically from day to day. The manufactured commodities have steady and fixed rates; the various steamship companies have agreements under the terms of which they will not change these latter rates except upon 30 or 60 days' notice to each other. No such agreement holds with regard to corn or wool or cotton or the foodstuffs which the world requires. The consequence is that the producer of these commodities is constantly at the mercy of the ocean carriers so far as the price he gets for his commodity is concerned, because in most instances the price of his commodity is fixed, not in the United States but in some foreign country. And therefore the farmer's price in the United States is the foreign price less the cost of carriage to the foreign port where the world price is made.

It is proposed under the terms of this resolution to allow the American delegate to the International Institute to bring up the question of an international commerce commission before the nations that are subscribers to the institute. This international commerce commission will be organized for the purpose of investigating ocean-carrying freight with the view of regulating the ocean-carrying freight, just as was done in the investigation and regulation of interstate railroad rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission in this country.

When it was first proposed to create the Interstate Commerce Commission it was held by many well-meaning people that it was not a matter that the Government had a right to take up at all. Gradually the decisions of the commission convinced the people of the United States that a good work was being accomplished by that commission, and Congress from time to time has passed additional legislation conferring broader and more extensive power on the Interstate Commerce Commission. I dare say that throughout the country to-day there is a feeling that the formation of that commission was an excellent piece of legislative work. How far the foreign countries will go in taking up and considering this matter we can not say. This resolution, as I understand it, does no more than to authorize the American delegate to present the matter in 1915 informally, and then formal action will be taken by the institute in 1917. Personally I feel the passage of the resolution is a step in the right direction. I recognize the fact that the project may meet with some opposition from the great maritime nations. But I believe many of the abuses that now exist in the ocean-carrying business ought to be regulated. Conditions that allow some of the steamship companies to maintain so-called "fighting" ships, whose purpose is to destroy competition by cutting rates to so low a figure that the competing company is driven from the zone occupied by the company that maintains the "fighting" ships, are highly injurious to the world's shippers. They ought to be eradicated, and the international commerce commission would be an instrument by means of which such conditions could be prevented.

It seems to me that if the ocean carriers can fix a definite rate on "package freight," which is the designation applied to manufactured articles, there is no substantial reason why a fixed rate can not be made on "bulk freight," as the staples of agriculture are designated in the ocean-carrying business. It may be contended that wheat and other grains are sometimes carried as ballast without any charges whatever for the ocean carriage. But while that may be true on some occasions, the great bulk of grain shipments across the water have to pay ocean freight.

And this, it seems to me, is the more essential, the more necessary, because "bulk freight" constitutes seven-ninths of all the merchandise carried on the seas. In other words, the staples of agriculture constitute nearly 78 per cent of all the cargoes carried on the world's great ocean highways. It seems obvious that if fluctuation in the cost of carrying this great mass of agricultural products can be prevented or even controlled, there must be greater certainty and stability in the prices the farmers of the great producing nations will receive for their products. I say, therefore, we are justified in passing this resolution in order that our delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture may endeavor to enlist the interest of the peoples of the world in this great problem.

Reference has been made here to Mr. David Lubin, the United States delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture. I have known him well for many years. He is a citizen of the State of California, where he has resided almost continuously since his boyhood. All his life his ambition has been to serve his fellow men, unselfishly, disinterestedly, earnestly. When the present king of Italy adopted Mr. Loubin's plan for an international institute of agriculture our Government appointed him as its delegate, and he has occupied that station since the institute was organized. He is an indefatigable worker—a man of tremendous energy and force. He is a student of the great problems that affect the welfare of the agriculturists the world over. He has given this subject of the ocean-carrying trade great thought and study. With the backing of his Government, as expressed in the pending resolution, I do not doubt but that he will be able to present the matter to the representatives of the world's maritime powers in a manner that will challenge their attention. If he can accomplish the object sought by the resolution, his countrymen, and especially the producers of farm products, will owe him an everlasting debt of gratitude.

ADJOURNMENT OVER MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday it adjourn to meet the following Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday next it adjourn to meet again on Tuesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are pressing matters that ought to be finished this week. I do not know how long the Alaskan coal bill will take. The situation in Alaska is such that they can not mine the coal out there. With a country full of coal they have to ship it in from other countries. I think it is very important that the bill should get through this week.

On the other hand, next Monday is unanimous-consent day, and I think it is important for the personnel of the House that the day should not be dispensed with. But as far as Labor Day is concerned, I know that a number of gentlemen have made engagements for that day, and I have no disposition to interfere with it, and if it will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to have him modify his request and ask that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on Tuesday, and that the business that will be in order on Monday shall be in order on Tuesday.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will accept that modification.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois modifies his request and asks that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on the next Tuesday, and that on Tuesday the business that would be in order on Monday shall be in order on Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to modify my request, and ask that when the House adjourn on Saturday it adjourn to meet on the following Tuesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withdraw that request at the present time, for I can not agree to that now.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will say that, as the gentleman probably knows, there are quite a number of Members who have engagements on Monday. I have none myself, and I expect to remain in Washington, so that it makes no difference to me, but a number of Members have made previous engagements—made them before the recent resolution was adopted—to be in their districts on that day. The campaign is on, and I think the gentleman from Alabama ought not to object. Of course, if he does I will withdraw the request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are some bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that his own people are interested in; they have been to see me about them, and they are bills which ought to be passed. I will make another request for a different order. I am anxious not to interfere with gentlemen who have engagements next Monday. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on Tuesday, and that it shall be in order on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal, to call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on Tuesday, and that on Tuesday the Calendar for Unanimous Consent shall be in order after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand from the statement of the gentleman that he is desirous this week of finishing the Alaskan coal bill, and that he would have no objection if we can get that bill out of the way even to adjourning on Friday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I will not say that. I will say to the gentleman candidly that I think the Clayton antitrust bill will go to conference probably between now and then; and if it does go to conference, I believe, if we clear up these emergency measures, we can get through this session of Congress by the 1st of October, if not sooner. I think it is more important that we should use the time in getting through than in adjourning. There is an exception for Labor Day, because lots of gentlemen have made engagements for that day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Alabama seriously think that adjourning over Saturday or Monday will have anything to do with or any influence upon the determination as to final adjournment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It might to some extent; but there are important bills here that gentlemen want to get through with.

Mr. MANN. We have been in session continuously for a year and a half, nearly—I do not know how long; I have lost the count, so far as I am concerned—and certainly no one would have a right to complain if the House should take one day off. Those who stayed here will not complain, and those who have just come back ought not to complain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is something in the gentleman's last remark, at any rate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if we get through with the Alaskan bill on Thursday and send the Clayton antitrust bill to conference on Friday, would not the gentleman be willing to adjourn over Saturday until the following Tuesday? There are a great many persons living near by—as far away even as Boston—who would like to take advantage of leaving here Friday afternoon and coming back here Tuesday, and if we can have some such assurance we would like to have it from the leader of the majority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is possible and probable that the President may desire to deliver a message to the House before that time

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that those who have stayed here regularly probably will not go away very far, and those who have now shown up for the first time in months ought to get acquainted with Washington before they go away again.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request, and when Friday comes, if there is no pressing business, we can take up then the question of adjourning over Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on the following Tuesday and that on Tuesday the Calendar for Unanimous Consent shall be called immediately after the reading of the Journal? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STEADYING THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has 15 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Virginia 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

[Mr. FALCONER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the subject of this resolution was called to my attention by Mr. David B. Lubin, who is the permanent delegate of the United States to the National Institute of Agriculture at Rome. He had read my report on steamship conferences and agreements in the domestic and foreign trade, and he was convinced that our Government would be impotent to enforce reasonable rates or stabilize rates on farm products in international trade in the absence of an international agreement, and that is true. In the bill which was drawn to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House bill 17328, we have gone just as far as we may under the law to bring all the lines, domestic and foreign, under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, so far as those engaged in the coastwise trade are concerned, to regulate their rates; but many reasons will suggest themselves to gentlemen why it is wholly impracticable for this Government to regulate international freight rates. I have not the time to enumerate them, much less to discuss them in detail, nor is it necessary at this time. The investigations made by the committee showed that, so far as package freight is concerned, the conference lines have a uniform rate, which usually is not raised or lowered until after 60 days' notice. The shippers who appeared before the committee were all unanimous in the opinion that the stabilizing of rates was very important in the export trade, and that it was very desirable that they might know how to make their contracts. They would then know one of the factors—and a very important one—in the price of the commodity they would sell for future delivery, namely, the freight rates to be charged on the commodity. Now, so far as grain is concerned, the testimony before the committee showed that the rate varies daily, if not hourly, often depending upon the demand upon the part of the great ocean liners for ballast. Under the agreement between the conference committee the quantity of grain that one of the ocean liners may carry is limited. Mr. Lubin contends, and with great force, that in order to steady the world's price of the staples it is necessary to stabilize the freight rates on the staples, and that this can not be done until the ocean freight rate on the commodity from the seaboard to the point of delivery in Europe or South America or elsewhere in our over-sea trade is known with reasonable certainty. In years past, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has said, the operators on boards of trade and chambers of commerce influenced the price of wheat, cotton, and other staples from day to day by giving out information, more or less guesswork and in many instances manipulated, with reference to the condition of crops and the probable yield in the different countries of the world.

The international institute at Rome, in which Mr. Lubin has so ably represented this Government as permanent delegate, has undertaken to correct this evil. The Government reports, the official reports, the forecasts, are made from time to time by the Government agencies of the 54 signatory States to this institute, and are compiled and disseminated to the different countries, and that element of speculation has been largely eliminated. Having accomplished this task, Mr. Lubin is in favor of taking another step. He is an enthusiast, but not an idle dreamer. He is of the opinion that if the 54 nations parties to the international convention of 1905 creating the International Institute of Agriculture, and supporting the institute, can be brought to agree to the establishment of an international commerce commission, vested with power to stabilize the rates or regulate the rates on the staples of agriculture, another essential factor in steadying the world's price of the products of the farm will be fixed and another element of speculation eliminated. I fully realized when I introduced this resolution that we were undertaking a difficult task, but that is no reason why we should not make the effort. It can not be accomplished in any other way. It is an international problem, and can only be solved by international agreement. This resolution does no more than to authorize Mr. Lubin, in October, to propose to the permanent committee the resolution set out in this joint resolution, which is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) instructing American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture to present to the permanent committee for action at the general assembly in 1915 certain resolutions.

Resolved, etc., That in accordance with the authority of letter (f) of article 9 of the treaty establishing the institute, which provides that it shall "submit to the approval of the Governments, if there be need, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers," the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture is hereby instructed to present (during the 1914 fall sessions) to the permanent committee the following resolutions, to the end that they may be submitted for action at the general assembly in 1915, so as to permit the proposed conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917:

"RESOLUTIONS.

"The general assembly instructs the International Institute of Agriculture to invite the adhering Governments to participate in an international conference on the subject of steadying the world's price of the staples.

"This conference shall consist of members appointed by each of the Governments adhering to the institute, and is to consider the advisability of formulating a convention for the establishment of a permanent international commerce commission on merchant marine and on ocean freight rates, with consultative, deliberative, and advisory powers.

"Said conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917."

If they regard it favorably they will present the resolution to the general assembly in 1915. If the general assembly agrees that it is a subject that will promote the interests of the farmers and they regard the time opportune, they will then take steps to call an international conference in 1917 to consider the question of organizing this international commerce commission, to be vested with the powers set out in the resolution. That is the whole question in a nutshell. We all agree that that is the only rational way to get at it. Whether it is possible to accomplish our purpose in that way or not, of course we do not know. That will depend upon the attitude of the nations controlling the larger part of the ocean-borne commerce of the world. I am quite sure it is worthy of the effort. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the following is the very able report Mr. Lubin has prepared to present to the permanent committee for consideration in connection with House joint resolution 311, if the latter becomes a law. I have not the time to read or comment on it in the brief time allotted to me:

STEADYING THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES—INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE—PROPOSAL FOR AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE REGULATION AND CONTROL OF OCEAN CARRIAGE BY MEANS OF AN INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE COMMISSION FOR THE PURPOSE OF STEADYING THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES.

(By David Lubin, delegate of the United States International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy.)

THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES—HOW IT IS ARRIVED AT—ITS BEARING ON THE ECONOMIC STATUS OF THE PEOPLE.

THE RESOLUTION.

The resolution concerning ocean freight rates on the staples passed by the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture at its April meeting calls for "proposals which it may see fit to submit on this subject to the general assembly" (May, 1915).

In accordance therewith, and acting under the authority of letter (f) of article 9 of the treaty establishing the institute, which provides that it shall "submit to the approval of the Governments, if there be need, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers," I propose that the permanent committee introduce the following resolution to the general assembly for adoption.

The general assembly instructs the International Institute of Agriculture to invite the adhering Governments to participate in an international conference on the subject of the regulation and control of ocean freight rates on the staples of agriculture.

This conference shall consist of members appointed by each of the Governments adhering to the institute, and is to consider the advisability of formulating a convention for the establishment of a permanent international commerce commission on merchant marine and ocean freight rates, said conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the next session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917.

In support of the above resolution I herewith submit the following paper:

TRANSPORTATION AND COMPETITION.

With the ever-increasing importance of transportation as a factor in the economic development and life of nations, Governments everywhere are assuming the right to set aside the competitive system in so far as it concerns the regulation of rates in domestic carriage. Take the case of railways, for instance:

"It was at one time an axiom of law and of political economy that prices should be determined by free competition. But in the development of the railway business it soon became evident that no such dependence on free competition was possible, either in practice or in theory. It produces an uncertainty with regard to rates which prevents stability of prices, and is apt to promote the interests of the unscrupulous speculator at the expense of those whose business methods are more conservative." As a result of these difficulties "operation by private companies, under specific provisions of the Government authorities with regard to the method of its exercise, has been the policy consistently carried out in France," and "there has been both in the United Kingdom and in the United States a progressive increase of legislative interference with railways." (Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. 22, pp. 824, 825, 826.)

In recognition of these facts the United States established its Interstate Commerce Commission, with ample power to control its railway traffic rates. In place of leaving the power of rate fixing in the hands of the railway companies, it has vested it in (a) the seven members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, (b) in the railway managers, and (c) in the United States courts, who together form the triune power governing the equities involved in the matter of rates.

SHIPPING RINGS AND MONOPOLIES.

Drawbacks similar to those formerly complained of in railway traffic are now seen to prevail in water carriage. As a result, the abuses alleged in the working of the present system of shipping rings and conferences are attracting the attention of the Governments. Important inquiries on the subject have been held in Great Britain and the United States. In Great Britain a royal commission was appointed, which in 1909 published its report. In the United States a movement is now on foot for extending the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to cover ocean carriage, both in the domestic and the foreign trade.

In pursuance of this movement resolutions were passed in February and June, 1912, by the United States House of Representatives, of which the following are excerpts:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the methods and practices of the various ship lines, both domestic and foreign, engaged in carrying our over-sea or foreign commerce and in the coastwise and inland commerce.

"That said committee shall report to the House all the facts disclosed by said investigation, and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto."

This committee has recently published its report, in four volumes, entitled "Proceedings of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the Investigation of Shipping Combinations under House Resolution 587."

I have received these volumes through the courtesy of the chairman, Mr. J. W. ALEXANDER, who in a letter of May 15 informs me that he would be pleased to receive my comments on the same. I therefore now purpose, in order to bring out more clearly the points in favor of my resolution, to comment on the evidence and findings of the committee as set forth in the report.

This report shows that the leading representatives of the commercial interests, and practically all the important navigation companies engaged in the domestic and foreign trade of the United States, gave testimony under oath at the committee's inquiries.

To begin with, the testimony brought out the following facts:

THE FACTS.

First. That the evils arising from former unrestricted competition in ocean carriage have driven the steamship companies to form understandings, conferences, and combinations.

Second. That these understandings, conferences, and combinations have led to the formation of great shipping trusts. These trusts control not only the lines directly owned by them, but also control, to a great extent, the traffic of the "tramp ships," all of which practically gives them a powerful and dangerous monopoly.

Third. That these monopolies give rise to and maintain excessive and unjust rates, and, by the use of "fighting ships" and by rebates to large shippers, tend also to bring forth other and dangerous monopolies—monopolies in buying and monopolies in selling.

As to the first point, the evils of unrestricted competition, the committee, in its "summary of evidence," says:

"Unrestricted competition, based on the survival of the fittest, tends to restrict the development of the lines and in the end must result in monopoly. * * * Competition in the steamship business was regarded as the demoralization rather than the life of trade; as the means of introducing uncertainty instead of certainty and inefficiency instead of efficiency. * * *" (Vol. 4, pp. 295, 300.)

On the same point the report furnished the committee by representatives of steamship companies states:

"Competition has never established a reasonable rate nor maintained a stable rate. * * * Rate wars tend to the monopolization of trade by the larger shippers. Unless the warring steamship factions come to some agreement the result is more or less of a monopoly on the part of the most powerful carrier engaged in the conflict." (Vol. 2, p. 1363.)

THE EFFECT.

And now as to the second point, the effect of the understandings, conferences, and combinations entered into by the shipping rings. The American and British reports show that these rings are attaining greater and greater magnitude throughout the world as time goes along. Let me quote an example:

"Practically all the well-known lines connecting north Atlantic American ports with those of the United Kingdom, north Europe, and the Mediterranean are parties to numerous freight agreements covering, in one way or another, nearly every sphere of the American-European trade. * * * over 40 regular trans-Atlantic lines are parties in their respective trades to at least 20 agreements involving the freight traffic, and the important lines are members of at least 4 main freight conferences. The 4 conferences referred to are the trans-Atlantic freight conference, the American Atlantic conference, the Atlantic conference, and the Mediterranean conference." (Vol. 4, p. 59.)

Summarizing the evidence obtained, the committee states in its report:

"It is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conferences, arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings, which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates, (2) the apportionment of traffic by allotting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry, (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic, or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines." (Vol. 4, p. 415.) "Steamship agreements and conferences are not confined to the lines engaging in the foreign trade of the United States. They are as universally used in the foreign trade of other countries as in our own." (Vol. 4, p. 416.)

RATE WARS.

"* * * The methods which have been adopted from time to time to eliminate competition show the futility of a weak line attempting to enter a trade in opposition to the combined power of the established lines when united by agreement. By resorting to the use of the 'fighting ship' or to unlimited rate cutting, the conference lines soon exhaust the resources of their antagonists. By distributing the loss resulting from the rate war over the several members of the conference, each constituent line suffers proportionately a much smaller loss than the one line which is fighting the entire group. Moreover, the federated lines can conduct the competitive struggle with the comfortable assurance that, following the retirement of the competing line, they are in a position to reimburse themselves through an increase in rates." (Vol. 4, p. 304.)

As showing the way in which the shipping rings absorb independent lines and control the ports, let me quote the testimony given before a "hearing" of the committee by one of the witnesses:

"Going back a good many years, there was an independent line from Baltimore to Rotterdam. * * * That line was absorbed and taken over by the Holland-American Line, and instead of Baltimore having an independent service the Baltimore service has been forced out, and we are now dependent on the allotment from the central agency in New York, which says 'Baltimore can do this much business,' and we can not do any more." (Vol. 2, p. 1289.)

THE COMPLAINTS.

And now, finally, for the third point, the excessive and unjust rates and the granting of rebates.

On the question of excessive rise in rates, Mr. J. W. Alexander, the chairman of the committee, stated:

"The testimony before the committee seems to indicate that the ocean rates have gone up from 100 to 200 per cent in the last 12 months, or, anyway, within the last two years." (Vol. 2, p. 801.)

Summarizing certain phases of the evil arising from the formation of shipping rings, the committee states:

"A considerable number of complaints were also filed with the committee objecting to excessive rates, discrimination between shippers in rates and cargo space, indifference to the handing of freight in proper condition, arbitrariness in the settlement of just claims, failure to give due notice to shippers when rates were to be increased, refusal to properly adjust rates as between various classes of commodities, and the unfairness of certain methods, such as 'fighting ships,' deferred rebates, and threats to refuse shipping accommodations, used by some conference lines to meet the competition of nonconference lines. * * * The conference lines so completely dominate the shippers with whom they deal that these shippers can not afford, for fear of retaliation, to place themselves in a position of active antagonism to the lines * * *." (Vol. 4, p. 417.)

On the question of rebates and the monopolies to which they give rise, Mr. HUMPHREY, a member of the committee, pointed out that the shipping conferences give "special rates to certain big interests in the United States, * * * among others, to the Standard Oil, what is known as the Harvester Trust, and what we generally term the Steel Trust." (Vol. 1, p. 267.)

And now let us see, from further evidence in the report, how the case would stand if there were no shipping conferences, if there were no shipping trusts; let us see how it would stand under a régime of open and unrestricted competition.

STABLE RATES.

On this head the contention is made that open competition, with its constantly fluctuating rates, prevents rational calculations of prices in buying and selling, whereas conferences secure stable rates, which permit of such calculations. In its report the committee makes the following statements with reference to the advantages claimed for shipping conferences as against open competition:

"Such agreements, it is contended, are a protection to both shipper and shipowner. To the shipper they insure desired stability of rates * * *. Stability of rates over long periods of time removes the inconvenience which would exist if merchants and shippers were obliged to quote different propositions (prices) on nearly every consignment, thus eliminating what was formerly an undesirable speculative risk under the open competitive system." (Vol. 4, pp. 295, 297.)

"Prominent exporting firms * * * are convinced that the present condition of fixed rates and regular sailing opportunities places all merchants upon the same basis as regards their estimates on contracts, and produces much better results for the exporter and manufacturer than could be possible under the old order of things * * * (under unrestricted competition) * * * Nothing is regarded so detrimental to the export trade as uncertainty regarding sailings and violent fluctuations in freight rates." (Vol. 4, p. 298.)

Under the shipping conferences "the rates filed are only subject to change after an agreed period of notice, varying from 30 to 60 days. * * *" (Vol. 4, p. 64.)

THE DISCREPANCY.

And right here there seems to be a wide discrepancy between the statements just quoted from the committee's report and those contained in letters from the Chambers of Commerce of New York and San Francisco. To facilitate the proposed work of the International Institute of Agriculture in publishing ocean freight rates on the staples, I wrote to some of the leading chambers of commerce in the United States, asking whether the data on current freight rates could be procured for regular publication in the institute's monthly bulletins. The Chamber of Commerce of New York in a communication of December 11, 1913, replied as follows:

"* * * It would be extremely difficult to give any definite information in regard to freights that would be of value in publishing the world's price for cereals. * * * You no doubt are aware that freight rates, particularly for agricultural products, change almost daily, and sometimes several times during the day, depending upon the demand or otherwise for freight room. Rates quoted to-day would be only for refusal for 24 hours, and they are constantly influenced by the fluctuating demand for room in the various steamers. * * * Frequently wheat has been carried between the United States and London free of any charge, being simply used for ballast in the steamers, and at other times the rate has advanced to 10d. and 12d. per bushel."

This statement was confirmed by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, which in a letter of April 3 says:

"Rates fluctuate from day to day, and a rate reported to-day might be twice as high or half as low to-morrow."

A similar statement is contained in the report submitted to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries by the representatives of the steamship lines running between New York and foreign countries, which says:

"Ocean freight rates vary not merely from month to month, but from day to day and from hour to hour, especially with reference to the great staples which are traded in on the exchanges." (Vol. 2, p. 1373.)

Thus, in one instance, we are told that the conferences fix rates which can only be changed on 30 or 60 days' notice; whereas the other statement claims that rates fluctuate from day to day and from hour to hour: that "wheat," for instance, "has been carried between the United States and London free of any charge, being simply used for ballast in the steamers, and that at other times the rate has advanced to 10d. and 12d. per bushel." How, then, can we reconcile these two and conflicting statements?

THE STAPLES EXCLUDED.

An explanation is seemingly at hand. The shipping conferences exclude the staples of agriculture from their fixed rates. These staples, as we are informed by the Chambers of Commerce of San Francisco and New York, are therefore left subject to sudden and violent fluctuations. Their exclusion from the fixed rates is clearly indicated by the following paragraph from the "Summary of Evidence" given in the committee's report, which states:

"The minimum rate agreement, however, does not cover the heavy bulk traffic, consisting of grain, flour, oil cake, cotton, and similar commodities, but is confined to the high-priced freight on which the shippers as well as the ship lines are anxious to have fixed rates equally applicable to all." (Vol. 4, p. 64.)

On this same head Mr. Franklin, vice president of the International Mercantile Co., in his evidence before the committee, says:

"The representatives of the various lines running to Liverpool meet and discuss their rates. * * * These rates are subject to change on certain notice; in some instances 30 days and in some instances 60 days. They cover only certain commodities; they do not cover the great bulk of traffic, which consists of grain, flour, oil cake, cotton, and other bulky commodities. They cover only miscellaneous traffic." (Vol. 1, p. 597.)

We thus see that the case stands as follows: The main freight traffic of a ship is classified under two headings, (a) the "package traffic" and (b) the "bulk traffic." Now, it is to be noted that while fixed rates are given on the merchandise composing the "package traffic" unfixed rates apply to the "bulk traffic," which consists, in the main, of the staples of agriculture.

And the question arises: What proportion does the "package traffic" bear to the "bulk traffic"?

In the testimony given before the committee by the vice president of one of the shipping rings, the International Mercantile Marine Co., it was brought out that of every 9,000 tons of traffic about 2,000 tons are carried as "package freight" at fixed rates and about 7,000 tons as "bulk freight" at unfixed rates, and, as just stated, this "bulk freight" embraces the staples of agriculture. (Vol. 1, p. 611.)

A SIGNIFICANT FACT.

We are thus brought face to face with a significant fact. On the one hand we see the importance attached in the inquiries on ocean carriage, both in Great Britain and in the United States, to the question of fixed rates for the "package traffic." On the other hand, we see the slurring over, the waiving aside of the question of unfixed rates for "bulk traffic," the traffic which consists mainly in the staples of agriculture. And yet, as is well known, the slightest change in the cost of carriage affects the price of the staples, not only the price of the quantity exported, but likewise so the price of the entire quantity for home use.

This slurring over, this waiving aside, this indifference was noticeable alike in the American and in the British inquiry. And no wonder, for both the inquiries were mainly concerned with points touching ocean freight rates as they affect (a) the public carrier, and (b) the shipper and merchant, whereas the economic influences resulting from the rates and conditions of the ocean carriage of the staples affect most keenly the producers and the consumers.

"GODFATHERS."

From the facts elicited at these inquiries, it would seem as though there are "godfathers," so to speak, on the lookout for all the interests involved excepting for those of the staples. There is a godfather for iron, the Steel Trust; a godfather for agricultural implements, the Harvester Trust; a godfather for oils, the Standard Oil Trust; there is a godfather for the carriers, the shipping rings; a godfather for the commission men and the dealers handling the "package traffic," the chamber of commerce and the board of trade; but there is no godfather for the staples of agriculture, no godfather to represent the interests of the producer and of the consumer.

But the question arises: Would it have made any practical difference to the outcome if the interests of the producer and of the consumer had been represented at these inquiries? Let us see.

It seems to me that, no matter how competent the testimony offered by a body representing the farmers or the consumers, no matter how honest the committee before which such testimony would be given, no matter how able the proposals for legislation which that committee might draft, it would all be ineffective unless the evidence given indicated the international bearing of the subject and unless the findings deduced therefrom recommended action on international lines. So long as the findings would fail to recommend international action they must necessarily fall short of applying adequate means to the ends in view. That this is worthy of serious consideration will be apparent from the following:

WHOM DOES IT CONCERN?

In the case of "package traffic" the terms and conditions of ocean carriage mainly concern the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer. In the case of "bulk traffic," the traffic in the staples of agriculture, the terms and conditions of ocean carriage concern the economic welfare of the people everywhere.

To illustrate: Under "package traffic" whether the rate on shipments of shoes or cutlery, for instance, be too low or too high, whether it be fixed or whether it fluctuate, whether the conditions be advantageous or disadvantageous, affects the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer.

But with "bulk traffic" the case is different. In the carriage of the staples of agriculture whether the rate be too low or too high, whether it be fixed or whether it fluctuate, whether the conditions be advantageous or disadvantageous, concerns not merely the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer, but it concerns the economic condition of the people everywhere, as will be shown further on.

At this time it would be well to bear in mind that while, on the one hand, "package traffic" comprises that class of merchandise which is bought and sold by private purchase and sale, by private contract, "bulk traffic," on the other hand, comprises, in the main, the staples of agriculture, which are bought and sold in the world's bourses and exchanges at the world's price.

THE WORLD'S PRICE.

And what do we mean when we say the "world's price"?

We mean the price that is tendered and accepted in the world's bourses and exchanges, which we might call the world's auction rooms.

And how is this prive arrived at?

The first factor in arriving at the world's price is the prevailing opinion as to the state of the world's supply. If the supply be above the normal, the price is expected to fall below the normal; if the supply be below the normal, the price is expected to rise above the normal.

By "supply" we do not mean the quantity produced or available in any one locality, in any one country; we mean the total world's supply. The supply in any given State may be above the normal, and yet if, at the same time, it be below the normal for the world, the price in that State should, nevertheless, be high; or, vice versa, the supply in a given State may be below the normal, yet if the world's supply be above the normal the price in that State should be low.

But the supply is by no means the only factor in the formation of the world's price. There is another factor and an important one—the cost of ocean carriage. If the average cost of ocean carriage be above the normal, it should correspondingly reduce the price paid to the producer below the normal; and, on the contrary, if the average cost of ocean carriage be below the normal, it should correspondingly raise the price paid to the producer above the normal.

Therefore, calculations on rational lines for arriving at a knowledge of what the world's price ought to be should, first of all, take into consideration the status of the world's supply, and, secondly, the status of the cost of ocean carriage.

THE EFFECT OF FIXED RATES.

If there were fixed rates for ocean carriage of the staples, the Liverpool buyer would be able to make offers for given quantities of wheat, for instance, on a basis of rational calculations. But let us take the case as it stands at present. A shipper at Buenos Aires receives an order for wheat to be delivered in Liverpool at the ruling world's price, at, say, $1 a bushel. How much should he pay for that wheat at Buenos Aires? If the cost of delivery is, say, 10 cents a bushel, the world's price should then be 90 cents a bushel in Buenos Aires. If the cost of delivery is 30 cents, the world's price in Buenos Aires should then be 70 cents. But if he is to ship the wheat in 30 or 60 days' time, how is the shipper to tell what the cost of carriage will then be? As the rates for the ocean carriage of the staples are not fixed, how is he to know? He does not know.

As we have seen, the Chamber of Commerce of New York states that wheat is carried "one time free of charge as ballast and at another time at a charge of 10d and 12d. per bushel; and the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce writes that "rates fluctuate from day to day, and a rate reported to-day might be twice as high or half as low to-morrow." Therefore the shipper must guess, and so must everyone else guess, so long as rates are unfixed. If the shipper wins on the guess, what he wins comes directly out of the pocket of the producer; if he loses, he tries hard to recoup himself in his next deal, and also out of the producer's pocket.

But this is only the beginning of the mischief. The confusion arising out of the system of unfixed rates for ocean carriage of the staples and the consequent uncertainty in price determining lead to economic evils so far-reaching as to affect the people everywhere.

A comprehensive grasp of the significance of this evil may be obtained by the consideration of the following:

PRIVATE SALE AND PUBLIC SALE.

In the case of "package freight," of chairs, stoves, shoes, etc., the rise or fall in the rates of ocean carriage on the same hardly affects their home price or their foreign price. If, for instance, the cost of ocean carriage on pianos were to advance from $5 to $20 each, it need not necessarily follow that owing to the $15 advance in freight rates all the pianos in the exporting country would decline by $15 or advance by $15 in the importing country, for the "package-traffic" merchandise is sold by private contract—by private sale. But with the "bulk freight," with the staples of agriculture, the case is quite different. Being sold on the world's bourses and exchanges at the world's price, it necessarily follows that a rise in ocean freight rates at one or more leading ports of an exporting country, by reducing the price on the quantity exported, must necessarily reduce the price on the remaining quantity in the home market, for the buyer on the bourses or exchanges, whether he buys for export or for home use, pays the same price.

We can thus see how sensitive to change is the world's price and the home price of the staples when influenced by unfixed rates for ocean carriage. Were there fixed rates for the carriage of the staples, subject, say, to 30 or 60 days' notice of change, as is the case with the "package traffic," it would then settle the major evil in the question before us—the evil of constant and unnecessary price disturbances.

RAISE AND LOWER THE PRICE AT WILL.

But apart from such disturbances, under the present system of unfixed rates, there is yet another point which calls for our consideration.

Under present conditions the chief directors of a few of the larger shipping rings by federating their efforts, are in a position to raise and lower, by previous arrangement, the prices of the staples in any and all of the principal ports of the world. Acting under exclusive and advance knowledge of the rates they will charge, they could lower the price of the staples by raising the cost of carriage and then, directly or indirectly, buy them in the bourses. They could then raise the price of the staples by lowering the cost of carriage when they would sell. They could thus, at will and by arrangement, lower the price of the product and buy, then raise the price and sell, and pocket the difference.

But the economic loss occasioned by such raising and lowering of prices at will would be very much greater than the amount the directors of the shipping rings might pocket, for raising or lowering the cost of carriage means raising or lowering the price of the staples on the home market directly and raising or lowering the world's price indirectly.

Besides this species of mischief there is, however, yet another within the power of the federated shipping rings. It is within their power, as we have seen from the case of Baltimore, to make and unmake ports, and, through this, to raise or lower the economic status of the nations; and this power is the more dangerous since such directors of shipping rings are irresponsible and free to act on the lines indicated. They are not expected to be guided by altruistic motives nor by high and statesmanlike political considerations.

"PACKAGE TRAFFIC" AND "BULK TRAFFIC."

Moreover, the fact that the "package traffic," representing 2,000 out of every 9,000 tons, enjoys fixed rates, whilst the "bulk traffic," the traffic in the staples, the traffic that represents 7,000 out of every 9,000 tons, is carried at unfixed rates, is, in itself, a terrible indictment of the present mode of procedure. Here we see that the price of the annual world's production of the staples, the value of which we may roughly estimate at a hundred billion dollars a year, and which represents the foodstuffs and the raw material for clothing and for house furnishing of all the people of the world, is permitted to be battledored and shuttlecocked through the action of the federated shipping rings.

We are thus forced to the conclusion that it is possible under this system for a few powerful directors of federated shipping rings to exert more effective economic control over the nations than can be exerted by any president, emperor, king, or prince; and so long as these federated shipping rings have it in their power to dictate at will the rise and fall in price of the world's food products, of the world's raw materials for clothing and for furnishing, so long do they, in reality, usurp a power which does not belong to them, a power which they should not have.

As matters stand at the present time, the unfixed rates for ocean carriage tend to convert the bourses and exchanges into price storm centers, storm centers which constantly give rise to waves of violent price disturbances, reacting at times in every direction.

Now, what harm do these price disturbances do?

What harm do they not do?

Unfixed rates of ocean carriage for the staples disturb, impede, and throw out of gear the whole mechanism of exchange.

FREE PLAY.

Right here we may aptly borrow the figure of the factory given by President Wilson in his book, "The New Freedom." Here is a workshop; the overhead and underneath shafting, the journals, the pulleys, and the belts are all lined out, true straight, trim, taut, and oiled, and all is well. But if the shafting be sprung or the journals unoiled the whole mechanism will be thrown out of gear.

It is just so in the industrial world. The law of competition should be permitted full and free play with no interference to impede its operation. But experience has made it plain over and over again that in the world of industry there is just one field in which competition, if allowed to operate, leads in the end to the "reductio ad absurdum" of the whole competitive system. The field that I refer to is that of transportation; competition in transportation impedes and interferes with the free play of competition in other and important fields.

This fact has been brought home so clearly to the American people that they have enacted laws excluding the railway carriers from the domain of competition by placing the regulation and control of rates in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. And the same reasoning that holds good for the regulation and control of railroad rates by an Interstate Commerce Commission would, as was shown before, likewise hold good for the regulation and control of ocean carriage through an international commerce commission.

The manner, now arbitrary, now fortuitous, in which the rates for ocean carriage of the staple are fixed; the lightning-like rapidity with which they are made to change; the gravity of the economic disturbances to which such sudden changes give rise; the far-reaching interrelated nature of their effects; the reaction produced by changes of rates in the ports of one nation on prices in the ports of another nation show clearly that if there is reason for placing domestic carriers under national regulation and control, there is yet stronger reason why ocean carriers should be placed under international regulation and control. If this contention be admitted, it then follows that my resolution for an international official conference to consider this matter is in order.

THE SITUATION.

And now let us briefly review the situation as made manifest by the British and American inquiries. We may summarize it as follows:

There are at present two modes of conducting the traffic business of ocean carriage:

(a) Through unrestricted competition.

(b) Through shipping rings and conferences.

In the final analysis, however, it would seem that unrestricted competition in ocean carriage is, in reality, but a mere hypothesis, for, as has been shown, such unrestricted competition invariably resolves itself down into a monopoly.

And again, if we examine the shipping rings and conferences which are at present the normal condition, we shall see that this condition also is but another name for monopoly.

We are thus brought face to face with the fact that both unrestricted competition and shipping rings alike lead to monopoly in the business of ocean carriage.

And what about this monopoly? In the American report we find the following:

"All monopolies are liable to abuse, and in our foreign carrying trade the monopoly obtained by the conference lines has not been subjected to any legal control." (Vol. 4, p. 304.)

And on the same head the British report says:

"All monopolies are liable to abuse to a greater or less extent unless they are strictly limited either by the nature of the case, by legislation, or by some form of supervision." (Report of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings, vol. 1, p. 98.)

And now it will be interesting to note the measures proposed by the American and by the British committees for holding in check this "monopoly," for curbing this "abuse."

BRITISH AND AMERICAN RECOMMENDATIONS.

On the one hand the British commission offers the following recommendation:

"Shippers and merchants in a given trade should form themselves into an association, so that they might be able to present a united front to the conference when any controversy arose." (Report of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings, vol. 1, p. 85.

The American committee, on the other hand, recommends:

"That navigation companies, firms, or lines engaged in the foreign trade of the United States be brought under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission as regards the regulation of rates, the approval of contracts entered into with other water carriers, with shippers, or with American railroads." (Vol. 4, p. 419.)

Thus, as we see, the British recommendation is for unofficial, the American for official, action, and both recommendations view the question purely from the national standpoint.

So far as the "package traffic" is concerned, these recommendations might be adequate. But would they cover the needs of the case were the "bulk traffic," the staples of agriculture, under consideration? I do not think so; for as the import, export, and home prices of the staples are governed by the world's price, the formation of which is influenced by the cost of carriage to the principal market centers of the world, and as any one nation is unable to regulate and control the terms and conditions of ocean carriage in the principal world's ports, therefore all attempts to regulate or control ocean carriage of the staples by any one nation must be inadequate.

INTERNATIONAL REGULATION AND CONTROL.

It would therefore seem to me that the nations should consider the advisability of establishing an international commerce commission for the regulation and control of ocean carriage. The influence of such international regulation and control, extending to the principal ports of the world, would supplement the world's official crop reports in guiding the formation of the world's price on an equitable basis. The first division of this work is already being performed; the crop reports now given out by the institute, under the auspices of the nations, are the official and authoritative summary of the world's supply. When this work would be supplemented by that of the international commerce commission it would then permit of rational calculations anywhere as to what the home price of the staples should be in its relation to the world's price.

And right here it may be apposite to relate an incident in the upbuilding of the institute pertinent to the subject.

Some eight years ago I called on Mr. James Wilson, the then Secretary of Agriculture, in an endeavor to win him over to the needs for an official international crop-reporting service. Mr. Wilson then expressed the opinion that such a service would be of no economic value to the United States. He claimed that the Department of Agriculture had its own crop-reporting service, which was sufficient for the needs of the American people, and that there was no call to enter on some new work which might serve the interests of other nations.

Subsequently, however, Mr. Wilson saw the matter in the light in which it was presented to him. He saw that all the crop reporting that the United States might do would be inadequate for the end in view; that the crop reports of one nation only are inadequate as a basis for arriving at the world's price; for the world's price is based on the world's supply; and in order to have the official reports of the world's supply it is necessary that crop reporting be done by all the nations of the world, and that the reports, and the world's summary of the same, be given out officially at regular intervals under international treaty. When Mr. Wilson saw this he then favored the international institute of Agriculture for this work.

AN INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Similarly, in the case of ocean carriage, action by a nation, limited to the regulation and control of the "package traffic" within its own country, can be had through a national institution like the Interstate Commerce Commission. The jurisdiction of such a commission might even be extended to embrace the ocean carriage of a nation at home and abroad; but if all this is intended to influence the equitable relation between the home price and the world's price of the staples it will surely fall far short of accomplishing what is intended. For, as has been shown, one of the principal factors in arriving at the world's price of the staples is a knowledge of the world's supply, and in arriving at a knowledge of what their home price should be in relation to their world's price, the leading factor would be the fixed rates for their ocean carriage. And just as the official report of the world's supply may only be had by means of an international crop-reporting service, so regulation and control of the ocean carriage of the staples may only be had through the medium of an international commerce commission.

Such an international commerce commission could be instituted by the nations under a treaty which should provide for its mode of representation and procedure. If it were granted powers similar to those of the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States, provision might then be made for it to work in conjunction with a branch of The Hague tribunal, especially constituted and empowered to adjudicate on points of law which might arise out of the commission's functions and decisions. But if its powers were limited to those of a consultative and advisory body, its delegates could then sit in session together with the representatives of the carriers of the shipping interests. The question whether the proposed international commerce commission should be granted powers to act, or whether its functions should be limited to those of a consultative and advisory body, may properly come before the conference called for in my resolution.

FIXED RATES FOR BULK TRAFFIC.

And now it is in order to review some of the objections likely to be raised to fixed rates for "bulk traffic."

The shipowner, for instance, is likely to say, "The unit of transportation by water is the total capacity of a ship. We can not cut off so many feet, as the railroad can, and leave them in New York if we do not want to use them." (Vol. 2, p. 1256.)

It would appear to me that this objection is more seeming than real, for a train of cars can not profitably be run unless there is freight for it, any more than a ship can be run without freight. If you are running a railway you must have freight to fill your cars or get out of business.

"But," it may be asked, "would not such a system of fixed rates overlook the character of the service rendered? Here, for instance, is a costly liner which makes the trip from New York to Liverpool in five days, and here are slower boats, the tramps and the sailing vessels; would the fixed rates apply equally to all?"

And the answer is: The fixed rates could be established according to the quality of the service. Rates could be fixed for first-class, second-class, and third-class service.

The next point that might be raised is that "bulk freight" is a physical necessity for a ship, without which it can not sail, for "the ship must be loaded down to its marks." This being the case, the carrier must be left free to hunt up this "bulk freight" wherever he can get it, and secure it sometimes at a high price, sometimes at a low price.

I believe this objection is also only seemingly valid. The fact is the "bulk freight" either has to be shipped or it does not have to be shipped. If it does not, there will be no use running after it; if it does, then it will come of its own accord.

At this point the carrier is likely to interrupt, saying, "This is all nonsense, for we certainly would have no shiploads if we did not run after the freight, and run after it on the 'give-and-take' method."

And here the carrier is correct; it is all nonsense, so far as conditions are to-day. But would not conditions be different under the proposed international commerce commission, under the proposed fixed rates? With no fixed rates the shrewd shipper of "bulk freight" knows well that at certain times the carrier is bound to tag after him. But with fixed rates for the season the shipper's game would be at an end. He would then always be glad enough to rush to the shipping office and "book" room for freight at the earliest moment possible; all of which would tend to promote the natural and steady flow of freight toward the ships.

THE DIVISION OF LABOR.

"But," says the objector, "would not this proposal to single out the ocean carrier by subjecting him to international control place him at a disadvantage Would it not materially interfere with his earning power? Would it not reduce his profits?"

I do not think so. I think it can be shown that the adoption of the proposal would be advantageous not only to the producers and the consumers, but also to the carriers.

"How?"

Let us see. By the term "civilization" do we not really mean that cumulative state of progress rendered possible by the division of labor? The savage does everything by himself. He is his own carpenter, his own tailor, his own architect, his own carrier. But, as we know, such work is far inferior to that accomplished under the division of labor.

And this division of labor takes place not only in the handicrafts but also in the field of commerce, in the field of government, and in the field of science. It is, in fact, but another term for "economies." In short, specialization of functions, division of labor, renders effort more effective and more economical. This being so, why not extend the system of the division of labor to the regulation and control of ocean carriage? If the specialization of functions, the division of labor is beneficial, in what field can it be more profitably employed than in this important one of ocean carriage, a field which concerns not only the shipowners but the Governments and the people everywhere?

Fortunately the channels through which the division of labor could be realized in the regulation and control of ocean carriage can readily be made available.

CHANNELS AVAILABLE FOR THE SERVICE.

First of all there could be the proposed international commerce commission, consisting of delegates who should be experts on the subject of ocean carriage. They should be in close official relationship with those departments and bureaus in the various Governments which deal, directly and indirectly, with the questions of internal carriage in their relation to foreign carriage.

In the second place there is the International Institute of Agriculture, which could be officially authorized to place itself in communication in the several adhering countries with (a) the chambers of commerce and boards of trade, and with (b) the national agricultural organizations, all with the end in view of gathering information toward the synchronization of incoming and outgoing cargoes, said information to be compiled and regularly transmitted to the international commerce commission.

In the third place, a branch of The Hague Tribunal could be constituted and empowered to adjudicate on points of international law which might arise out of the commission's functions and decisions.

It is not difficult to see that all this, when once in operation, would be likely to bring about two important results.

THE PLAY OF FORCES.

First, by promoting the synchronization of incoming and outgoing cargoes it would tend to remove the uncertainties and perplexities which now beset the ocean carrier's business. In short, the focusing of information under the proposed system would make it possible to replace the present unfixed rates for the staples now abnormally low, now again abnormally high, by fixed average rates.

Second, such fixed average rates replacing the present uncertainties, violent fluctuations, and consequent losses would tend toward the more equitable formation of the world's price of the staples, and by steadying that equitable price would promote the economic interests of the people everywhere.

In other words, the adoption of the proposed system would set in motion a play of forces which, beginning in the township with the farmer and his product, working upward through the several channels indicated, thence through the international commerce commission, would tend to normalize the ebb and flow of the economic currents throughout the world of commerce and industry.

THE INTEREST OF THE PRODUCER.

And now we may expect the producer to intervene. "May not unfixed rates, in reality, mean low rates? Has it not been shown that under unfixed rates the carrier is often compelled to transport the staples as ballast free of any charge? Does not this system thus provide the lowest rate? And is it not likely that all this may profit the producer?"

Let us see. If the shipper were to give the producer his share of the difference between the price he actually received and the price he ought to have received whenever the staples were carried as ballast, then the above remarks might to some extent be justified. But how is the shipper, buying as he does in the wheat pit, to hunt up and identify the original owner of the product? And even if the shipper could hunt him up, what would induce him to give back part of his gains to the producer? Nothing that I know of. There is not even a remote chance that the producer will profit by the levy which the shipper raises on the carrier whenever he can compel him to carry freight free as ballast.

The producer's interests can not be served by abnormally low freight rates any more than by abnormally high freight rates; but they can be served by the fixed average rates which the adoption of the proposal here advocated would permit. Such fixed published rates would make it possible for the producer anywhere to arrive at a just approximation of what his home price ought to be in its relation to the world's price, and this would insure to him the best possible results.

But supposing some farmer, working, say, 160 acres of land, were to ask, "Of what value would the adoption of this proposal be to me, since I neither export my product nor sell it to exporters?"

The answer is a simple one; the home price is derived from the world's price, and the world's price is influenced by the cost of ocean carriage. Let the cost of ocean carriage fluctuate through unfixed rates, and it causes the world's price to fluctuate, which, in turn, causes fluctuation of the home price. Steadying the cost of ocean carriage steadies the world's price and steadies the home price of the staples, thus benefiting the farmer who neither exports nor sells to exporters as well as the farmers who export.

THE GOVERNMENTS.

Let us now inquire how the proposal for fixed rates under an international commerce commission would be received by the Governments.

It seems likely that it would be favored by the Governments of the exporting nations, the nations which have the staples of agriculture for sale. But how about the importing nations, the nations that are compelled to buy?

Had this question been asked some 25 years ago, we might have expected the statesman of that day to have given some such answer as the following:

"We are not here as champions of altruism, nor for promoting doctrinaire theories as to equitable distribution. We know what we want. We want foodstuffs and raw materials at the very lowest price at which it may be possible for us to obtain them. The lower our influence can depress the world's price of the staples the better it is for us; the more abundant will be the food of our people and the cheaper will be the raw materials for our factories."

But, with the progress of our times, the statesman of to-day is likely to reason differently; he is likely to answer in this wise:

"We can not afford to force prices in the exporting countries below the normal. Our investments in those countries, the need we have of them as buyers of our manufactured goods, are sufficient inducements to warrant us in using our efforts to influence commerce in the staples along perfectly just and equitable lines, and this both at home and abroad."

THE STATESMAN.

But how will the case stand with those nations which possess a powerful merchant marine? Let us see what the statesman in such a country would have been likely to say some 25 years ago.

"We are not concerned with prices and their equities in foreign countries. In order to conserve and increase our national strength we are primarily concerned in the preservation and development of our merchant marine. We can not, therefore, afford to do anything that would be likely to hamper its freedom or subject its movements to international regulation."

But in our day the answer is likely to be different. The modern statesman is likely to reason:

"While a powerful merchant marine is essential to the well-being of a State, there is another consideration of far greater importance, and that is the well-being of all the people in that State, the well-being of its men, of its women, of its children. Our people must have work; they must eat and wear clothes and furnish their dwellings, and all of this is influenced by stability and equity in the price of the staples. Now, while the merchant marine may force prices in certain markets below their due level, it by no means follows that the products thus lowered will reach the consumers, the people of our State, at that low level. But it is certain that the deteriorating influences set going by the unfixed rates for ocean carriage, with the speculation they give rise to, will adversely affect not only the producer but also the consumer."

There is yet another phase of the question which the statesman will, no doubt, bear in mind when considering the merchant marine, and that is the need of preserving the economic stability of the colonial possessions of the buying countries. The mother country may be a buyer of the staples; the colonies are almost always sellers. The lamb's gentle bleat will be likely to meet with a sympathetic response from its dam.

THE PROTECTIONIST.

But what will be the opinion of the stateman in a protection country which is neither an extensive exporter nor an importer of the staples?

Twenty-five years ago it is quite likely that such a statesman would have said:

"Yes; I see the wanton waste caused by design or fortuity in forcing the world's price to deflect from the line of the normal through the influences exercised by unfixed rates for the ocean carriage of the staples. It is a grievous injury to many, no doubt. But thanks to our system of protection, and thanks to our independence from the influences exercised by the exporting and importing markets, we are not affected by the evil trend thus imparted. Protection gives us our own special normal, our own price, independent of the world's price."

But the modern statesman is likely to reason:

"Protection is but another name for an artificial barrier. We have the artificial barrier, it is true, but for all that, and above and beyond it, the world's price rules here as it does in every other part of the world. We have the world's price, first of all, and on top of that the artificial enhancement which protection gives to our producers, and which comes out of the pockets of our consumers. It thus follows that we are fully as much interested in maintaining the world's price at its normal level as are the exporting or importing nations."

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION.

In summing up my argument in favor of the resolution, I wish to say that just as the regulation and control of the world's reports on the production of the staples required official international action, so the regulation and control of the terms and conditions for their ocean carriage also requires official international action.

Without such international action there can be no guaranty for equitable and fixed rates in the carriage of the staples. The absence of these equitable and fixed rates must necessarily give rise to disturbances throughout the economic world, by forcing values to deflect from the line of the normal.

In concluding my arguments in favor of the adoption of the resolution, I wish to say that there seem to be three ways of disposing of the question before us. One would be to leave matters alone, to let the problems solve themselves. Another would be to live in the hope that the carriers may presently become so wise and disinterested that they will solve the question of their own accord and set matters right. But if in this matter, as in all others, adequate means are essential to the attainment of rational ends, we are forced to set aside both of these ways. This leaves the third way, that of action on the lines of the resolution submitted, the working out of the system indicated therein.

An impartial review of the subject must lead the statesman to the conclusion that this question can not be solved by action on empyrical lines. The problems of ocean carriage as they affect any one port, or all the ports of any one country, are, after all, but phases and fractions, portions of the questions when it is considered as a whole. Viewed as a whole the problems transcend the limits of any one country; they are interrelated and concern all the countries of the world.

The time has passed when the statesman could dismiss this question with a waive of the hand. Population everywhere is increasing by leaps and bounds, and so is popular education. All this is equivalent to saying that wants are increasing. And it is clear that the highest aim of good statesmanship is to see that the demands arising out of these increased wants are not stupidly and unjustly frustrated by causes which have their root in inequities in the formation of the world's price of the staples.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, to my mind this resolution is a movement in the right direction. To anyone who has made even a cursory study of ocean rates on farm products, it is at once evident that something should be done to steady or make more stable these rates. As it is to-day, one who wishes to calculate the price of a staple farm product in any State of the Union, the price of the product being set by some foreign market, is unable to do so for the reason that one of the principal elements that determines the local market price is unknown, namely, the cost of ocean carriage. If one wishes to know to-day in Iowa, in Minnesota, in South Dakota, or in North Dakota the price that wheat should bring in any town in one of these States, he first ascertains the price in Liverpool, the market that sets the price of wheat for the world. To determine the local market price of wheat of any staple farm product whose price is dependent upon the foreign market, it is at once clear that one must deduct from the foreign market price the cost of carriage from the local market to the foreign market. To determine the price of wheat in any local market one would naturally first inquire the cost of carriage from the local market to the seaboard. This is readily ascertained, and is found to be a certain fixed and definite cost, which in this country is now subject to change only after approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission and after from 30 to 90 days' notice being given to the public.

Next in order, it is necessary to know the cost of ocean carriage from the seaboard to Liverpool. Strange as it may seem, this is found not to be possible of ascertainment with any degree of certainty, for all ocean rates for bulk products under the present methods and under present shipping practice are subject to wide variations without notice to the shipper from day to day and even from hour to hour.

While under the present methods of shipping staple farm products overseas it may cost 5 cents a bushel to ship wheat from New York to Liverpool on one day or during a given week, it may cost 10 cents a bushel to ship wheat from New York to Liverpool the next day or during the next week, and then, again, the following day or during the following week wheat may be shipped from New York to Liverpool for 1 cent a bushel, or even for a much lower rate than this.

Since the cost of carriage from the seaboard to Liverpool can not be ascertained by the buyer in the local market, the price that should be paid for wheat in the local market can not be accurately determined. As a consequence the buyer in the local market, to be on the safe side, usually calculates the rate of carriage from the seaboard to Liverpool at the maximum rate charged and deducts this and the cost of transportation from the local market to the seaboard from the Liverpool price of wheat, making the remainder a local market price to be paid to the producer.

For illustration, if the market price of wheat in Liverpool is $1, to determine the local price of wheat in Minneapolis, Minn., there must be deducted from the Liverpool price the cost of carriage from Minneapolis to New York, the seaboard, and the cost of ocean carriage from New York to Liverpool. While the cost of carriage from Minneapolis to New York can be accurately ascertained, the cost of ocean carriage from New York to Liverpool is an unknown and uncertain factor. Consequently, the maximum rate of carriage that at times may be exacted from New York to Liverpool is calculated, and the price of wheat in the local market in Minneapolis determined to a large extent thereby. In this way the seller on the Minneapolis market, who is the real producer of the grain, fails to receive the benefit of ocean rates less than the maximum rate at times charged between New York and Liverpool.

The fact that ocean carriage on staple farm products can be raised or lowered at a moment's notice, and at the whim and will of the shipping rings and combinations, leaves room for tremendous gambling operations on grain prices and levies each year heavy tolls on both the producer and the consumer.

As a consequence of the many abuses prevailing in water-rate carriage, both in domestic and foreign commerce, due to shipping conferences, rings, and monopolies, important inquiries have been made during the past few years, both in Great Britain and in the United States. A royal commission appointed in Great Britain made and published an exhaustive report on this subject in 1909. During the Sixty-second Congress the House of Representatives on July 16, 1912, passed House resolution No. 578, which was introduced on June 16, 1912, by Mr. ALEXANDER, chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The following are the first two sections of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the methods and practices of the various ship lines, both domestic and foreign, engaged in carrying our oversea or foreign commerce and in the coastwise and inland commerce, and the connection between such ship lines and railroads and other common carriers, and between such lines and forwarding, ferry, towing, dock, warehouse, lighterage, or other terminal companies or firms or transportation agencies, and to investigate whether any such ship lines have formed any agreements, understandings, working arrangements, conferences, pools, or other combinations among one another, or with railroads or other common carriers, or with any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, for the purpose of fixing rates and tariffs, or of giving and receiving rebates, special rates, or other special privileges or advantages, or for the purpose of pooling or dividing their earnings, losses, or traffic, or for the purpose of preventing or destroying competition; also to investigate as to what methods, if any, are used by such ship lines, foreign or domestic, and railroads and other common carriers, or of any of the companies, firms, or other transportation agencies referred to in this section, to prevent the publication of their methods, rates, and practices in the United States; also to investigate and report to what extent and in what manner any foreign nation has subsidized or may own any vessels engaged in our foreign commerce; also to investigate and report to what extent any vessel lines and companies or any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, engaged in our foreign or coastwise or inland commerce, are owned or controlled by railway companies, by other ship lines or companies, or by any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, or by the same interests and persons owning or controlling railroad companies, ship lines, or other common carriers, or any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section; and said committee shall further investigate whether the conduct or methods or practices of said foreign steamship lines are in contravention of our commercial treaties or in violation of our laws, and what effect said methods and practices have on the commerce and freight rates of the United States; and shall further investigate what effect such combinations, agreements, understandings, working arrangements, and practices of railroads and our coastwise and inland shipping lines, or of railroads and such shipping lines and any of the companies, firms, or transportation agencies referred to in this section, or of railroads and oversea shipping lines, whether domestic or foreign, if any are found to exist, have on the commerce and freight rates of the United States, and whether the same are in violation of the laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said committee shall report to the House all the facts disclosed by said investigation and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto.

Under authority of this resolution the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries made a very full investigation of water rates of transportation and of the existing shipping combinations, conferences, and monopolies. The hearings held before the committee, the committee's recommendations and conclusions, and all proceedings had under authority of the resolution are contained in a published report consisting of four volumes. Much very valuable material on the subject of both foreign and domestic water rates is contained in this report.

Ocean freight traffic is commonly classified under two headings: First, "Package traffic"; second, "Bulk traffic." The latter classification includes grain, flour, oil cake, cotton, and other bulky commodities. From the extensive hearings held under the authority of House resolution No. 587, to which I have just referred, it appears that of the ocean freight tonnage carried about two-ninths consists of "package traffic" and about seven-ninths of "bulk traffic."

The testimony of Mr. Franklin, vice president of the International Mercantile Marine Co., of New York, before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, as well as the testimony of others, disclosed that while there are fixed rates on "package traffic," which rates can not be changed without from 30 to 60 days' notice to those engaged in shipping, there are no fixed or certain rates on "bulk traffic."

This condition gives to the federated shipping interests a most dangerous power. There is no good reason or argument that can be advanced as to why the "package traffic" consisting of but two-ninths of the freight shipments should enjoy fixed rates, while the "bulk traffic" making up seven-ninths of the freight shipments has no fixed rates. Because this condition prevails the federated shipping interests and other gamblers in the price of the staples, the value of which is estimated to be a hundred billion dollars a year, and which represents the foodstuffs and raw materials for clothing and household furnishings of all the people of all the world, hold the power to dictate at will the rise and fall in the price of the world's agricultural products. This power has long since been recognized as one of the most important factors in connection with railroad transportation in this country, and the control and regulation of rates on "bulk traffic" as well as "package traffic" has been wisely and properly placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Since the import, export, and home price of the staples of agriculture are governed by the world's price, the formation of which is, as I have before suggested, influenced by the cost of carriage from the local market to the principal market centers of the world, and as no one nation is able to regulate and control the terms and conditions of ocean carriage of the principal world ports, any successful attempts to regulate or control ocean carriage of staples must necessarily be made through an international organization, such as the International Institute of Agriculture.

This House joint resolution, which I am informed has the earnest approval and indorsement of Hon. David Lubin, the very able and learned permanent delegate of the United States to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, and which is in the following terms:

Resolved, etc., That in accordance with the authority of letter (f) of article 9 of the treaty establishing the institute, which provides that it shall "submit to the approval of the Governments, if there be need, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers," the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture is hereby instructed to present (during the 1914 fall sessions) to the permanent committee the following resolutions, to the end that they may be submitted for action at the general assembly in 1915, so as to permit the proposed conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917:

RESOLUTIONS.

"The general assembly instructs the International Institute of Agriculture to invite the adhering Governments to participate in an international conference on the subject of steadying the world's price of the staples.

"This conference shall consist of members appointed by each of the Governments adhering to the institute, and is to consider the advisability of formulating a convention for the establishment of a permanent international commerce commission on merchant marine and on ocean freight rates, with consultative, deliberative, and advisory powers.

"Said conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917."

Will, in my judgment, if passed by this Congress, set in motion the machinery necessary to bring together a conference of the nations of the world which will evolve and adopt practical means and methods of controlling, regulating, and making stable the ocean rates on all ocean freight traffic.

The International Institute of Agriculture at Rome since its establishment by convention entered into on June 7, 1905, has done lasting and valuable work for the interest of the farmers of the world through its weekly and monthly authentic world crop reports made to the countries signatory to the convention and, through them, to the public. Due to the work being carried on by this international institute, reliable statistics of the world's agricultural products are to-day made easily available to every farmer and to every business man. The diffusion of this information has been a large factor in steadying the price of agricultural products. Fifty-four nations are now signatories to the international convention which founded the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome. If the support of these nations through the International Institute of Agriculture can be secured to an agreement for the establishment of an international commerce commission vested with power to regulate or stabilize ocean freight rates on the staples of agriculture, another most important factor in steadying the world's price of farm products will be fixed and another large element of speculation will be eliminated. The spirit as well as the substance embodied in this resolution should, in my judgment, be accorded the support of every man on the floor of this Chamber. This is not a party measure. It is more than a national question. It is an international problem which in no uncertain measure affects the living and the welfare of the masses of the people of all the world. I trust the resolution may soon be adopted by the Congress, and that it may be successful in accomplishing the good work its author purposes it to accomplish. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I heard the testimony given by Mr. David Lubin, and by other thoroughly informed witnesses, as to the merits of this resolution, and I am convinced that it ought to pass. The facts are very simple. Seven-ninths of the entire ocean traffic is what is called bulk traffic, and practically all of this comes from the farms of the country. When farm products are carried on land the farmers know precisely what the freight rate is. And the railroads can not change that freight rate without first giving notice of 30 or 60 days; and even then they can not change it without the consent of the commission, which before reaching a decision takes into account the interests of the railroads and the interests of the shippers. Whereas ocean freight rates on grain, as was shown by the testimony, may vary in an hour from 1 cent to 25 cents a bushel. This resolution simply provides as its ultimate purpose that the International Institute of Agriculture shall call an international conference to consider the subject of steadying the world's price of the staples of agriculture and the advisability of establishing an international commerce commission on merchant marine with advisory and consultative powers concerning the rates to be paid on ocean traffic. It is a resolution of great importance, and I hope that it will pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I assume that this resolution will pass, but I do not believe it will do any good. It may do some harm. It will apparently put the Government of the United States on record in favor of stability of ocean freight rates. There is one way to have stable ocean rates, and that is to have comparatively high rates and to cut out competition. Ocean rates have been reduced from time to time for many years, gradually falling, with some variation——

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No. I have but 9 minutes and the gentleman had 10. I hope I may be permitted to make this suggestion, and then, if the gentleman desires to ask a question, I will be glad to yield.

There is a competition in ocean freight rates, notwithstanding all that has been said. If all the regular line steamers are in combination, that still does not affect the tramp vessels. It has not been unusual for the tramp steamer or the tramp sailing vessel to come into a port looking for a cargo. They go where they think the cargoes will be, and the rate which they charge will depend upon the demand for cargo space. When we have a large quantity of exports from a particular place the rate will keep up. When there is a supply of vessels and a shortage of demand, the rate will fall. The freight rate on grains from the West to the East has been reduced to a very large percentage by lake competition. Lake competition has been such in the past—and it usually takes some time to have a complete effect upon railroad rates—lake competition has been such in the past that frequently steamers have carried grain from Chicago to Buffalo for a cent a bushel. Competition did it. If you had had an interstate commerce commission fixing rates, there would have been no rate fixed as low as that. That does not pay interest on the investment. But when the supply is large in the way of cargo space and the demand is small, the shipper makes his own terms.

Now, gentlemen say that this does not benefit the farmer any. All of the various circumstances that enter into prices for and against lower or higher prices meet together on the Chicago Board of Trade as to corn and wheat and other grain, and at other places accordingly, and the consensus of all the combinations bring out the price.

To-day we are met with a peculiar situation which itself shows that the statements of Mr. Lubin and those of the committee on this joint resolution are in error. They say that the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool, and that the farmer can not tell what price he is going to get, because we have not stable ocean rates, but that if the farmer knew what the ocean rate was he could tell exactly what his wheat was worth in Kansas City or on the farm by subtracting from the Liverpool price the rate.

A little while ago wheat was 80 cents a bushel, with a large crop in this country. Every grain speculator in the land believed there would be a reduction in the price of wheat. The European war broke out. The newspapers throughout the country published the fact that grain would increase in price, that there would be a great demand for wheat and flour in Europe. The members of the Chicago Board of Trade rather laughed at the idea that it would be possible to largely put up the price of wheat in the face of the exceedingly large crop and the lack of vessels to ship the wheat abroad.

But what have been the facts? The people throughout the country, fearing that there would be an increase in the price of flour, bought two barrels of flour where they bought one barrel before, or bought one barrel of flour where they bought a sack before. There has been more flour sold in this country in the last 30 days than was ever sold before in the country in 40 days' time or more.

The millers met the demand for flour—how? They have to have wheat. But the farmers were holding their wheat back. They were not paying any attention to the Liverpool quotations, nor to the freight rate from here to Liverpool. They held their wheat back, and wheat has gone up 25 cents a bushel in a month's time—more than that for May wheat—thus disproving every assertion which the economists have made for years, or which many of the economists have made, and which the committee make in reference to this proposition.

Now, it is to the interest of the farmers to have cheap ocean rates. I have given as much attention to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the interstate-commerce law as any Member on this floor. I said years ago that the interstate-commerce law, when we gave the Interstate Commerce Commission full power over rates, would stabilize rates, but that it would increase rates. You never can stabilize rates anywhere without a gradual increase in the rates.

Now, the people of our country, in close competition with each other in different sections and different cities, desired stable rates, because unstable rates gave one city in competition with another an advantage over the other. But when it comes to foreign rates we would rather have cheap rates than stable rates. When grain is carried across the Atlantic Ocean for nothing as ballast, as has been the case on many occasions, that very fact puts up the price of grain to the farmer in this country.

Mr. Lubin desires that the farmer may know, as he says, what he is going to get, but will fix it so that he will get less money. My belief is that the farmer would rather have a little more money and not know in advance just how much it is. The farmer deals with uncertainties as to his crops. He does not know how much wheat he is going to have. He would rather have a larger amount of money at the end of the season than to know, to begin with, just how much he would have.

The effect of this resolution, if it amounts to anything, is to put the Congress on record as favoring the proposition that we will have high ocean rates, but we shall know what they are, and that a tramp steamer coming into port can not carry wheat or corn or cotton for any less than any other steamer can carry it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this resolution. I have had the pleasure of reading over the hearings and also of hearing the statements and presentation of the matter by Mr. Lubin a number of times. No one who has heard his personal presentation of the matter, knowing the questions involved and their magnitude, and what it means to the farmers of this country, can deny that it is the most convincing argument ever made or written. These arguments are based on experience and, we believe, the facts. A stable freight rate over the ocean or a steadying of the rates would mean that the farmer and the producer of seven-ninths of all the commodities used in the world that are transported by freight would reap the benefit, and he would know exactly what he was going to get. He would not be subjected to gambling in the markets in fixing the rates.

The International Institute of Agriculture, having its seat at Rome, Italy, is a permanent Government institution created by treaties signed June 7, 1905, between the United States and the following powers: Italy, Montenegro, Russia, Argentine Republic, Roumania, Servia, Belgium, Salvador, Portugal, Mexico, Luxemburg, Switzerland, Persia, Japan, Ecuador, Bulgaria, Denmark, Spain, France, Sweden, the Netherlands, Greece, Uruguay, Germany, Cuba, Austria-Hungary, Norway, Egypt, Great Britain, Guatemala, Ethiopia, Nicaragua, Brazil, Costa Rica, Chile, Peru, China, Paraguay, and Turkey. Since the creation of the institute 14 other powers have become adherents, making the total number at this time 54 nations represented in the institution.

Confining its operations within an international sphere, the institute is authorized and directed, among other things, to submit to the approval of the Governments, if there be need, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers, and it is under the subsection designated "f," article 9 of the treaty referred to, that it is proposed to instruct the American delegate to offer a resolution inviting the adhering Governments to participate in an international conference on the subject of steadying the world's price of the staple agricultural products.

If the invitation thus extended is accepted, a conference consisting of delegates or members named by each of the adhering Governments will meet in Rome to consider the advisability of formulating a convention for the establishment of a permanent international commerce commisson on merchant marine and on ocean freight rates, with consultative, deliberative, and advisory powers.

Hearings were held on the resolution, and the testimony taken developed the following facts:

That of the entire ocean freight traffic, seven-ninths consist of bulk traffic, the greater proportion of which is the staples of agriculture.

That two-ninths of the total ocean freight traffic consist of package traffic, including practically all manufactured articles.

That while the freight rate on package traffic can not be changed by the carriers without giving 30 to 60 days' notice to shippers, the rate on bulk traffic may be, and in fact is, changed without notice and fluctuates hourly.

That the domestic price of the staples of agriculture is governed by the export price, which fluctuates with the rise and fall of ocean freight rates on bulk traffic.

That the world's price of the staples of agriculture can not be steadied until a fixed rate can be established on bulk traffic the same as package traffic.

Independent of the abnormal conditions which now obtain, the ocean freight rates have increased within the past two years from 100 to 200 per cent and are controlled absolutely by a shipping trust which arbitrarily fixes the charge for carrying the staple commodities, and the burden of increased rates has been borne largely by the bulk traffic. The broad, international scope of the question is patent and it is one of primary importance to every agricultural nation in the world.

The following paper submitted by Mr. Lubin before the Committee on Foreign Affairs fully justifies the passage of this resolution:

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE—PROPOSAL FOR AN INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE REGULATION AND CONTROL OF OCEAN CARRIAGE BY MEANS OF AN INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE COMMISSION FOR THE PURPOSE OF STEADYING THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES.

(By David Lubin, delegate of the United States International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy.)

THE WORLD'S PRICE OF THE STAPLES—HOW IT IS ARRIVED AT—ITS BEARING ON THE ECONOMIC STATUS OF THE PEOPLE.

THE RESOLUTION.

The resolution concerning ocean freight rates on the staples passed by the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture at its April meeting calls for "proposals which it may see fit to submit on this subject to the general assembly" (May, 1915).

In accordance therewith, and acting under the authority of letter (f) of article 9 of the treaty establishing the institute, which provides that it shall "submit to the approval of the Government, if there be need, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers," I propose that the permanent committee introduce the following resolution to the general assembly for adoption.

The general assembly instructs the International Institute of Agriculture to invite the adhering Governments to participate in an international conference on the subject of the regulation and control of ocean freight rates on the staples of agriculture.

This conference shall consist of members appointed by each of the Governments adhering to the institute, and is to consider the advisability of formulating a convention for the establishment of a permanent international commerce commission on merchant marine and ocean freight rates. Said conference to be held in Rome during the fortnight preceding the next session of the general assembly of the institute in 1917.

In support of the above resolution I herewith submit the following paper:

TRANSPORTATION AND COMPETITION.

With the ever-increasing importance of transportation as a factor in the economic development and life of nations, governments everywhere are assuming the right to set aside the competitive system in so far as it concerns the regulation of rates in domestic carriage. Take the case of railways, for instance.

"It was at one time an axiom of law and of political economy that prices should be determined by free competition. But in the development of the railway business it soon became evident that no such dependence on free competition was possible, either in practice or in theory. It produces an uncertainty with regard to rates which prevents stability of prices, and is apt to promote the interests of the unscrupulous speculator at the expense of those whose business methods are more conservative." As a result of these difficulties "operation by private companies, under specific provisions of the Government authorities with regard to the method of its exercise, has been the policy consistently carried out in France," and "there has been both in the United Kingdom and in the United States a progressive increase of legislative interference with railways." (Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. 22, pp. 824, 825, 826.)

In recognition of these facts the United States established its Interstate Commerce Commission with ample power to control its railway traffic rates. In place of leaving the power of rate fixing in the hands of the railway companies, it has vested it in (a) the seven members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, (b) in the railway managers, and (c) in the United States courts, who together form the triune power governing the equities involved in the matter of rates.

SHIPPING RINGS AND MONOPOLIES.

Drawbacks similar to those formerly complained of in railway traffic are now seen to prevail in water carriage. As a result, the abuses alleged in the working of the present system of shipping rings and conferences are attracting the attention of the Governments. Important inquiries on the subject have been held in Great Britain and the United States. In Great Britain a royal commission was appointed which, in 1909, published its report. In the United States a movement is now on foot for extending the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to cover ocean carriage, both in the domestic and the foreign trade.

In pursuance of this movement resolutions were passed in February and June, 1912, by the United States House of Representatives, of which the following are excerpts:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the methods and practices of the various ship lines, both domestic and foreign, engaged in carrying our over-sea or foreign commerce and in the coastwise and inland commerce.

"That said committee shall report to the House all the facts disclosed by said investigation, and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto."

This committee has recently published its report, in four volumes, entitled "Proceedings of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the Investigation of Shipping Combinations under House resolution 587."

I have received these volumes through the courtesy of the chairman, Mr. J. W. ALEXANDER, who, in a letter of May 15, informs me that he would be pleased to receive my comments on the same. I therefore now purpose, in order to bring out more clearly the points in favor of my resolution, to comment on the evidence and findings of the committee as set forth in the report.

This report shows that the leading representatives of the commercial interests, and practically all the important navigation companies engaged in the domestic and foreign trade of the United States, gave testimony under oath at the committee's inquiries.

To begin with, the testimony brought out the following facts:

THE FACTS.

First. That the evils arising from former unrestricted competition in ocean carriage have driven the steamship companies to form understandings, conferences, and combinations.

Second. That these understandings, conferences, and combinations have led to the formation of great shipping trusts. These trusts control not only of lines directly owned by them, but also control, to a great extent, the traffic of the "tramp ships," all of which practically gives them a powerful and dangerous monopoly.

Third. That these monopolies give rise to and maintain excessive and unjust rates, and, by the use of "fighting ships" and by rebates to large shippers, tend also to bring forth other and dangerous monopolies—monopolies in buying and monopolies in selling.

As to the first point, the evils of unrestricted competition, the committee, in its "summary of evidence," says:

"Unrestricted competition, based on the survival of the fittest, tends to restrict the development of the lines and in the end must result in monopoly. * * * Competition in the steamship business was regarded as the demoralization rather than the life of trade; as the means of introducing uncertainty instead of certainty, and inefficiency instead of efficiency. * * *" (Vol. 4, pp. 295, 300.)

On the same point the report furnished the committee by representatives of steamship companies states:

"Competition has never established a reasonable rate nor maintained a stable rate. * * * Rate wars tend to the monopolization of trade by the larger shippers. Unless the warring steamship factions come to some agreement the result is more or less of a monopoly on the part of the most powerful carrier engaged in the conflict." (Vol. 2, p. 1363.)

THE EFFECT.

And now as to the second point, the effect of the understandings, conferences, and combinations entered into by the shipping rings. The American and British reports show that these rings are attaining greater and greater magnitude throughout the world as time goes along. Let me quote an example:

"Practically all the well-known lines connecting North Atlantic American ports with those of the United Kingdom, North Europe, and the Mediterranean are parties to numerous freight agreements covering in one way or another nearly every sphere of the American-European trade * * * over 40 regular trans-Atlantic lines are parties in their respective trades to at least 20 agreements involving the freight traffic, and the important lines are members of at least four main freight conferences. The four conferences referred to are the trans-Atlantic Freight Conference, the American Atlantic Conference, the Atlantic Conference, and the Mediterranean Conference." (Vol. 4, p. 59.)

Summarizing the evidence obtained, the committee states in its report:

"It is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conferences, arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings, which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates, (2) the apportionment of traffic by allotting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry, (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic, or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines." (Vol. 4, p. 415.) "Steamship agreements and conferences are not confined to the lines engaging in the foreign trade of the United States. They are as universally used in the foreign trade of other countries as in our own." (Vol. 4, p. 416.)

RATE WARS.

"* * * The methods which have been adopted from time to time to eliminate competition show the futility of a weak line attempting to enter a trade in opposition to the combined power of the established lines when united by agreement. By resorting to the use of the 'fighting ship' or to unlimited rate cutting, the conference lines soon exhaust the resources of their antagonists. By distributing the loss resulting from the rate war over the several members of the conference, each constituent line suffers proportionately a much smaller loss than the one line which is fighting the entire group. Moreover, the federated lines can conduct the competitive struggle with the comfortable assurance that, following the retirement of the competing line, they are in a position to reimburse themselves through an increase in rates." (Vol. 4, p. 304.)

As showing the way in which the shipping rings absorb independent lines and control the ports, let me quote the testimony given before a "hearing" of the committee by one of the witnesses:

"Going back a good many years, there was an independent line from Baltimore to Rotterdam. * * * That line was absorbed and taken over by the Holland-American Line; and instead of Baltimore having an independent service, the Baltimore service has been forced out, and we are now dependent on the allotment from the central agency in New York, which says 'Baltimore can do this much business,' and we can not do any more." (Vol. 2, p. 1289.)

THE COMPLAINTS.

And now, finally, for the third point: The excessive and unjust rates and the granting of rebates.

On the question of excessive rise in rates Mr. J. W. ALEXANDER, the chairman of the committee, stated:

"The testimony before the committee seems to indicate that the ocean rates have gone up from 100 to 200 per cent in the last 12 months, or, anyway, within the last two years." (Vol. 2, p. 801.)

Summarizing certain phases of the evil arising from the formation of shipping rings, the committee states:

"A considerable number of complaints were also filed with the committee objecting to excessive rates, discrimination between shippers in rates and cargo space, indifference to the landing of freight in proper condition, arbitrariness in the settlement of just claims, failure to give due notice to shippers when rates were to be increased, refusal to properly adjust rates as between various classes of commodities, and the unfairness of certain methods, such as 'fighting ships,' deferred rebates, and threats to refuse shipping accommodations used by some conference lines to meet the competition of nonconference lines. * * * The conference lines so completely dominate the shippers with whom they deal that these shippers can not afford, for fear of retaliation, to place themselves in a position of active antagonism to the lines * * *." (Vol. 4, p. 417.)

On the question of rebates and the monopolies to which they give rise, Mr. HUMPHREY, a member of the committee, pointed out that the shipping conferences give "special rates to certain big interests in the United States, * * * among others to the Standard Oil, what is known as the Harvester Trust, and what we generally term the 'Steel Trust.'" (Vol. 1, p. 267.)

And now let us see from further evidence in the report how the case would stand if there were no shipping conferences, if there were no shipping trusts; let us see how it would stand under a régime of open and unrestricted competition.

STABLE RATES.

On this head the contention is made that open competition with its constantly fluctuating rates prevents rational calculations of prices in buying and selling, whereas conferences secure stable rates which permit of such calculations. In its report the committee makes the following statements with reference to the advantages claimed for shipping conferences as against open competition.

"Such agreements, it is contended, are a protection to both shipper and shipowner. To the shipper they insure desired stability of rates. * * * Stability of rates over long periods of time removes the inconvenience which would exist if merchants and shippers were obliged to quote different propositions (prices) on nearly every consignment, thus eliminating what was formerly an undesirable speculative risk under the open competitive system." (Vol. 4, pp. 295, 297.)

"Prominent exporting firms * * * are convinced that the present condition of fixed rates and regular sailing opportunities places all merchants upon the same basis as regards their estimates on contracts, and produces much better results for the exporter and manufacturer than could be possibly under the old order of things * * * (under unrestricted competition). * * * Nothing is regarded so detrimental to the export trade as uncertainty regarding sailings and violent fluctuations in freight rates." (Vol. 4, p. 298.)

Under the shipping conferences "the rates filed are only subject to change after an agreed period of notice, varying from 30 to 60 days. * * *." (Vol. 4, p. 64.)

THE DISCREPANCY.

And right here there seems to be a wide discrepancy between the statements just quoted from the committee's report and those contained in letters from the Chambers of Commerce of New York and of San Francisco. To facilitate the proposed work of the International Institute of Agriculture in publishing ocean freight rates on the staples, I wrote to some of the leading chambers of commerce in the United States, asking whether the data on current freight rates could be procured for regular publication in the institute's monthly bulletins. The Chamber of Commerce of New York, in a communication of December 11, 1913, replied as follows:

"* * * It would be extremely difficult to give any definite information in regard to freights that would be of value in publishing the world's price for cereals. * * * You no doubt are aware that freight rates, particularly for agricultural products, change almost daily and sometimes several times during the day, depending upon the demand or otherwise for freight room. Rates quoted to-day would be only for refusal for 24 hours, and they are constantly influenced by the fluctuating demand for room in the various steamers. * * * Frequently wheat has been carried between the United States and London free of any charge, being simply used for ballast in the steamers, and at other times the rate has advanced to 10d. and 12d. per bushel."

This statement was confirmed by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, which, in a letter of April 3, says:

"Rates fluctuate from day to day, and a rate reported to-day might be twice as high or half as low to-morrow."

A similar statement is contained in the report submitted to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries by the representatives of the steamship lines running between New York and foreign countries, which says:

"Ocean freight rates vary not merely from month to month, but from day to day and from hour to hour, especially with reference to the great staples which are traded in on the exchanges." (Vol. 2, p. 1373.)

Thus, in one instance, we are told that the conferences fix rates which can only be changed on 30 or 60 days' notice; whereas the other statement claims that rates fluctuate from day to day and from hour to hour; that "wheat," for instance, "has been carried between the United States and London free of any charge, being simply used for ballast in the steamers, and that at other times the rate has advanced to 10d. and 12d. per bushel." How, then, can we reconcile these two and conflicting statements?

THE STAPLES EXCLUDED.

An explanation is seemingly at hand. The shipping conferences exclude the staples of agriculture from their fixed rates. These staples, as we are informed by the Chambers of Commerce of San Francisco and New York, are therefore left subject to sudden and violent fluctuations. Their exclusion from the fixed rates is clearly indicated by the following paragraph from the "Summary of Evidence" given in the committee's report, which states:

"The minimum rate agreement, however, does not cover the heavy bulk traffic, consisting of grain, flour, oil cake, cotton, and similar commodities, but is confined to the high-priced freight on which the shippers as well as the ship lines are anxious to have fixed rates equally applicable to all." (Vol. 4, p. 64.)

On this same head Mr. Franklin, vice president of the International Mercantile Co., in his evidence before the committee, says:

"The representatives of the various lines running to Liverpool meet and discuss their rates. * * * These rates are subject to change on certain notice; in some instances 30 days and in some instances 60 days. They cover only certain commodities; they do not cover the great bulk of traffic, which consists of grain, flour, oil cake, cotton, and other bulky commodities. They cover only miscellaneous traffic." (Vol. 1, p. 597.)

We thus see that the case stands as follows: The main freight traffic of a ship is classified under two headings, (a) the "package traffic" and (b) the "bulk traffic." Now it is to be noted that while fixed rates are given on the merchandise composing the "package traffic" unfixed rates apply to the "bulk traffic," which consists in the main of the staples of agriculture.

And the question arises: What proportion does the "package traffic" bear to the "bulk traffic"?

In the testimony given before the committee by the vice president of one of the shipping rings, the International Mercantile Marine Co., it was brought out that of every 9,000 tons of traffic about 2,000 tons are carried as "package freight" at fixed rates, and about 7,000 tons as "bulk freight" at unfixed rates, and, as just stated, this "bulk freight" embraces the staples of agriculture. (Vol. 1, p. 611.)

A SIGNIFICANT FACT.

We are thus brought face to face with a significant fact. On the one hand we see the importance attached in the inquiries on ocean carriage, both in Great Britain and in the United States, to the question of fixed rates for the "packing traffic." On the other hand we see the slurring over, the waiving aside of the question of unfixed rates for "bulk traffic," the traffic which consists mainly in the staples of agriculture. And yet, as is well known, the slightest change in the cost of carriage affects the price of the staples, not only the price of the quantity exported, but likewise so the price of the entire quantity for home use.

This slurring over, this waiving aside, this indifference, was noticeable alike in the American and in the British inquiry. And no wonder, for both the inquiries were mainly concerned with points touching ocean freight rates as they affect (a) the public carrier and (b) the shipper and merchant, whereas the economic influences resulting from the rates and conditions of the ocean carriage of the staples affect most keenly the producers and the consumers.

"GODFATHERS."

From the facts elicited at these inquiries it would seem as though there are "godfathers," so to speak, on the lookout for all the interests involved excepting for those of the staples. There is a godfather for iron, the Steel Trust; a godfather for agricultural implements, the Harvester Trust; a godfather for oils, the Standard Oil Trust; there is a godfather for the carriers, the Shipping Rings; a godfather for the commission men and the dealers handling the "package traffic," the chamber of commerce and the board of trade; but there is no godfather for the staples of agriculture, no godfather to represent the interests of the producer and of the consumer.

But the question arises: Would it have made any practical difference to the outcome if the interests of the producer and of the consumer had been represented at these inquiries? Let us see.

It seems to me that no matter how competent the testimony offered by a body representing the farmers or the consumers, no matter how honest the committee before which such testimony would be given, no matter how able the proposals for legislation which that committee might draft, it would all be ineffective unless the evidence given indicated the international bearing of the subject and unless the findings deduced therefrom recommended action on international lines. So long as the findings would fail to recommend international action, they must necessarily fall short of applying adequate means to the ends in view. That this is worthy of serious consideration will be apparent from the following:

WHOM DOES IT CONCERN?

In the case of "package traffic" the terms and conditions of ocean carriage mainly concern the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer. In the case of "bulk traffic," the traffic in the staples of agriculture, the terms and conditions of ocean carriage concern the economic welfare of the people everywhere.

To illustrate, under "package traffic," whether the rate on shipments of shoes or cutlery, for instance, be too low or too high, whether it be fixed or whether it fluctuate, whether the conditions be advantageous or disadvantageous, affects the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer.

But with "bulk traffic" the case is different. In the carriage of the staples of agriculture, whether the rate be too low or too high, whether it be fixed or whether it fluctuate, whether the conditions be advantageous or disadvantageous, concerns not merely the carrier, the shipper, and the dealer, but it concerns the economic condition of the people everywhere, as will be shown further on.

At this time it would be well to bear in mind that, while on the one hand "package traffic" comprises that class of merchandise which is bought and sold by private purchase and sale, by private contract, "bulk traffic," on the other hand, comprises in the main the staples of agriculture which are bought and sold in the world's bourses and exchanges at the world's price.

THE WORLD'S PRICE.

And what do we mean when we say the "world's price"?

We mean the price that is tendered and accepted in the world's bourses and exchanges, which we might call the world's auction rooms.

And how is this price arrived at?

The first factor in arriving at the world's price is the prevailing opinion as to the state of the world's supply. If the supply be above the normal, the price is expected to fall below the normal; if the supply be below the normal, the price is expected to rise above the normal.

By "supply" we do not mean the quantity produced or available in any one locality, in any one country; we mean the total world's supply. The supply in any given State may be above the normal, and yet if, at the same time, it be below the normal for the world, the price in that State should nevertheless be high. Or, vice versa, the supply in a given State may be below the normal, yet if the world's supply be above the normal the price in that State should be low.

But the supply is by no means the only factor in the formation of the world's price. There is another factor, and an important one—the cost of ocean carriage. If the average cost of ocean carriage be above the normal, it should correspondingly reduce the price paid to the producer below the normal. And, on the contrary, if the average cost of ocean carriage be below the normal, it should correspondingly raise the price paid to the producer above the normal.

Therefore calculations on rational lines for arriving at a knowledge of what the world's price ought to be should, first of all, take into consideration the status of the world's supply, and, secondly, the status of the cost of ocean carriage.

THE EFFECT OF FIXED RATES.

If there were fixed rates for ocean carriage of the staples, the Liverpool buyer would be able to make offers for given quantities of wheat, for instance, on a basis of rational calculations. But let us take the case as it stands at present. A shipper at Buenos Aires receives an order for wheat to be delivered in Liverpool at the ruling world's price, at, say, $1 a bushel; how much should he pay for that wheat at Buenos Aires? If the cost of delivery is, say, 10 cents a bushel, the world's price should then be 90 cents a bushel in Buenos Aires. If the cost of delivery is 30 cents, the world's price in Buenos Aires should then be 70 cents. But if he is to ship the wheat in 30 or 60 days' time, how is the shipper to tell what the cost of carriage will then be? As the rates for the ocean carriage of the staples are not fixed, how is he to know? He does not know

As we have seen, the Chamber of Commerce of New York states that wheat is carried at one time free of charge as ballast and at another time at a charge of 10d. and 12d. per bushel; and the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce writes that "rates fluctuate from day to day, and a rate reported to-day might be twice as high or half as low to-morrow." Therefore the shipper must guess, and so must everyone else guess, so long as rates are unfixed. If the shipper wins on the guess, what he wins comes directly out of the pocket of the producer; if he loses, he tries hard to recoup himself in his next deal, and also out of the producer's pocket.

But this is only the beginning of the mischief. The confusion arising out of the system of unfixed rates for ocean carriage of the staples and the consequent uncertainty in price determining lead to economic evils so far-reaching as to affect the people everywhere.

A comprehensive grasp of the significance of this evil may be obtained by the consideration of the following:

PRIVATE SALE AND PUBLIC SALE.

In the case of "package freight," of chairs, stoves, shoes, etc., the rise or fall in the rates of ocean carriage on the same hardly affects their home price or their foreign price. If, for instance, the cost of ocean carriage on pianos were to advance from $5 to $20 each, it need not necessarily follow that owing to the $15 advance in freight rates all the pianos in the exporting country would decline by $15 or advance by $15 in the importing country, for the "package traffic" merchandise is sold by private contract—by private sale. But with the "bulk freight," with the staples of agriculture, the case is quite different. Being sold on the world's bourses and exchanges, at the world's price, it necessarily follows that a rise in ocean freight rates at one or more leading ports of an exporting country, by reducing the price on the quantity exported must necessarily reduce the price on the remaining quantity in the home market, for the buyer on the bourses or exchanges, whether he buys for export or for home use, pays the same price.

We can thus see how sensitive to change is the world's price and the home price of the staples when influenced by unfixed rates for ocean carriage. Were there fixed rates for the carriage of the staples, subject, say, to 30 or 60 days' notice of change, as is the case with the "package traffic," it would then settle the major evil in the question before us, the evil of constant and unnecessary price disturbances.

RAISE AND LOWER THE PRICE AT WILL.

But apart from such disturbances, under the present system of unfixed rates there is yet another point which calls for our consideration. Under present conditions the chief directors of a few of the larger shipping rings, by federating their efforts, are in a position to raise and lower, by previous arrangement, the prices of the staples in any and all of the principal ports of the world. Acting under exclusive and advance knowledge of the rates they will charge they could lower the price of the staples by raising the cost of carriage and then, directly or indirectly, buy them in the bourses. They could then raise the price of the staples by lowering the cost of carriage, when they would sell. They could thus, at will, and by arrangement, lower the price of the product and buy, then raise the price and sell, and pocket the difference.

But the economic loss occasioned by such raising and lowering of prices at will would be very much greater than the amount the directors of the shipping rings might pocket, for raising or lowering the cost of carriage means raising or lowering the price of the staples on the home market directly, and raising or lowering the world's price indirectly.

Besides this species of mischief, there is, however, yet another within the power of the federated shipping rings; it is within their power, as we have seen from the case of Baltimore, to make and unmake ports, and through this to raise or lower the economic status of the nations. And this power is the more dangerous since such directors of shipping rings are irresponsible and free to act on the lines indicated. They are not expected to be guided by altruistic motives nor by high and statesmanlike political considerations.

"PACKAGE TRAFFIC" AND "BULK TRAFFIC."

Moreover, the fact that the "package traffic," representing 2,000 out of every 9,000 tons, enjoys fixed rates, whilst the "bulk traffic," the traffic in the staples, the traffic that represents 7,000 out of every 9,000 tons, is carried at unfixed rates, is in itself a terrible indictment of the present mode of procedure. Here we see that the price of the annual world's production of the staples, the value of which we may roughly estimate at a hundred billion dollars a year, and which represents the foodstuffs and the raw material for clothing and for house furnishing of all the people of the world, is permitted to be battledored and shuttlecocked through the action of the federated shipping rings.

We are thus forced to the conclusion that it is possible under this system for a few powerful directors of federated shipping rings to exert more effective economic control over the nations than can be exerted by any president, emperor, king, or prince; and so long as these federate shipping rings have it in their power to dictate at will the rise and fall in price of the world's food products, of the world's raw materials for clothing and for furnishing, so long do they, in reality, usurp a power which does not belong to them, a power which they should not have.

As matters stand at the present time, the unfixed rates for ocean carriage tend to convert the bourses and exchanges into price storm centers, storm centers which constantly give rise to waves of violent price disturbances, reacting at times in every direction.

Now, what harm do these price disturbances do?

What harm do they not do?

Unfixed rates of ocean carriage for the staples disturb, impede, and throw out of gear the whole mechanism of exchange.

FREE PLAY.

Right here we may aptly borrow the figure of the factory given by President Wilson in his book, The New Freedom. Here is a workshop; the overhead and underneath shafting, the journals, the pulleys, and the belts are all lined out, true, straight, trim, taut, and oiled, and all is well. But if the shafting be sprung or the journals unoiled, the whole mechanism will be thrown out of gear.

It is just so in the industrial world. The law of competition should be permitted full and free play with no interference to impede its operation. But experience has made it plain over and over again that in the world of industry there is just one field in which competition, if allowed to operate, leads in the end to the "reductio ad absurdum" of the whole competitive system. The field that I refer to is that of transportation; competition in transportation impedes and interferes with the free play of competition in other and important fields.

This fact has been brought home so clearly to the American people that they have enacted laws excluding the railway carriers from the domain of competition by placing the regulation and control of rates in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. And the same reasoning that holds good for the regulation and control of railroad rates by an Interstate Commerce Commission would, as was shown before, likewise hold good for the regulation and control of ocean carriage through an International Commerce Commission.

The manner, now arbitrary, now fortuitous, in which the rates for ocean carriage of the staple are fixed; the lightning-like rapidity with which they are made to change; the gravity of the economic disturbances to which such sudden changes give rise; the far-reaching interrelated nature of their effects; the reaction produced by changes of rates in the ports of one nation on prices in the ports of another nation show clearly that if there is reason for placing domestic carriers under national regulation and control, there is yet stronger reason why ocean carriers should be placed under international regulation and control. If this contention be admitted, it then follows that my resolution for an international official conference to consider this matter is in order.

THE SITUATION.

And now let us briefly review the situation as made manifest by the British and American inquiries. We may summarize it as follows:

There are, at present, two modes of conducting the traffic business of ocean carriage:

(a) Through unrestricted competition;

(b) Through shipping rings and conferences.

In the final analysis, however, it would seem that unrestricted competition in ocean carriage is, in reality, but a mere hypothesis, for, as has been shown, such unrestricted competition invariably resolves itself down into a monopoly.

And again, if we examine the shipping rings and conferences which are, at present, the normal condition, we shall see that this condition also is but another name for monopoly.

We are thus brought face to face with the fact that both unrestricted competition and shipping rings alike lead to monopoly in the business of ocean carriage.

And what about this monopoly? In the American report we find the following:

"All monopolies are liable to abuse, and in our foreign carrying trade the monopoly obtained by the conference lines has not been subjected to any legal control." (Vol. 4, p. 304.)

And on the same head the British report says:

"All monopolies are liable to abuse to a greater or less extent unless they are strictly limited, either by the nature of the case, by legislation, or by some form of supervision." (Report of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings, vol. 1, p. 98.)

And now it will be interesting to note the measures proposed by the American and by the British committees for holding in check this "monopoly," for curbing this "abuse."

BRITISH AND AMERICAN RECOMMENDATIONS.

On the one hand, the British commission offers the following recommendation:

"Shippers and merchants in a given trade should form themselves into an association, so that they might be able to present a united front to the conference when any controversy arose." (Report of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings, vol. 1, p. 85.)

The American committee, on the other hand, recommends:

"That navigation companies, firms, or lines engaged in the foreign trade of the United States be brought under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission as regards the regulation of rates, the approval of contracts entered into with other water carriers, with shippers, or with American railroads." (Vol. 4, p. 419.)

Thus, as we see, the British recommendation is for unofficial, the American for official, action, and both recommendations view the question purely from the national standpoint.

So far as the "package traffic" is concerned, these recommendations might be adequate. But would they cover the needs of the case were the "bulk traffic," the staples of agriculture, under consideration? I do not think so; for as the import, export, and home prices of the staples are governed by the world's price the formation of which is influenced by the cost of carriage to the principal market centers of the world, and as any one nation is unable to regulate and control the terms and conditions of ocean carriage in the principal world's ports, therefore all attempts to regulate or control ocean carriage of the staples by any one nation must be inadequate.

INTERNATIONAL REGULATION AND CONTROL.

It would therefore seem to me that the nations should consider the advisability of establishing an international commerce commission for the regulation and control of ocean carriage. The influence of such international regulation and control, extending to the principal ports of the world, would supplement the world's official crop reports in guiding the formation of the world's price on an equitable basis. The first division of this work is already being performed; the crop reports now given out by the institute, under the auspices of the nations, are the official and authoritative summary of the world's supply. When this work would be supplemented by that of the international commerce commission it would then permit of rational calculations anywhere as to what the home price of the staples should be in its relation to the world's price.

And right here it may be apposite to relate an incident in the upbuilding of the institute pertinent to the subject.

Some eight years ago I called on Mr. James Wilson, the then Secretary of Agriculture, in an endeavor to win him over to the needs for an official international crop-reporting service. Mr. Wilson then expressed the opinion that such a service would be of no economic value to the United States. He claimed that the Department of Agriculture had its own crop-reporting service, which was sufficient for the needs of the American people, and that there was no call to enter on some new work which might serve the interests of other nations.

Subsequently, however, Mr. Wilson saw the matter in the light in which it was presented to him. He saw that all the crop reporting that the United States might do would be inadequate for the end in view; that the crop reports of one nation only are inadequate as a basis for arriving at the world's price, for the world's price is based on the world's supply; and in order to have the official reports of the world's supply it is necessary that crop reporting be done by all the nations of the world, and that the reports, and the world's summary of the same, be given out officially at regular intervals under international treaty. When Mr. Wilson saw this, he then favored the International Institute of Agriculture for this work.

AN INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Similarly, in the case of ocean carriage, action by a nation, limited to the regulation and control of the "package traffic" within its own country, can be had through a national institution like the Interstate Commerce Commission. The jurisdiction of such a commission might even be extended to embrace the ocean carriage of a nation at home and abroad; but if all this is intended to influence the equitable relation between the home price and the world's price of the staples it will surely fall far short of accomplishing what is intended. For, as has been shown, one of the principal factors in arriving at the world's price of the staples is a knowledge of the world's supply, and in arriving at a knowledge of what their home price should be in relation to their world's price the leading factor would be the fixed rates for their ocean carriage. And just as the official report of the world's supply may only be had by means of an international crop-reporting service, so regulation and control of the ocean carriage of the staples may only be had through the medium of an international commerce commission.

Such an international commerce commission could be instituted by the nations under a treaty which should provide for its mode of representation and procedure. If it were granted powers similar to those of the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States, provision might then be made for it to work in conjunction with a branch of The Hague tribunal, especially constituted and empowered to adjudicate on points of law which might arise out of the commission's functions and decisions. But if its powers were limited to those of a consultative and advisory body, its delegates could then sit in session together with the representatives of the carriers of the shipping interests. The question whether the proposed international commerce commission should be granted powers to act, or whether its functions should be limited to those of a consultative and advisory body, may properly come before the conference called for in my resolution.

FIXED RATES FOR BULK TRAFFIC.

And now it is in order to review some of the objections likely to be raised to fixed rates for "bulk traffic."

The shipowner, for instance, is likely to say: "The unit of transportation by water is the total capacity of a ship. We can not cut off so many feet, as the railroad can, and leave them in New York if we do not want to use them." (Vol. 2, p. 1256.)

It would appear to me that this objection is more seeming than real, for a train of cars can not profitably be run unless there is freight for it, any more than a ship can be run without freight. If you are running a railway you must have freight to fill your cars or get out of business.

"But," it may be asked, "would not such a system of fixed rates overlook the character of the service rendered? Here, for instance, is a costly liner which makes the trip from New York to Liverpool in five days, and here are slower boats, the tramps and the sailing vessels; would the fixed rates apply equally to all?"

And the answer is: The fixed rates could be established according to the quality of the service. Rates could be fixed for first-class, second-class, and third-class service.

The next point that might be raised is that "bulk freight" is a physical necessity for a ship, without which it can not sail, for "the ship must be loaded down to its marks." This being the case, the carrier must be left free to hunt up this "bulk freight" wherever he can get it, and secure it sometimes at a high price, sometimes at a low price.

I believe this objection is also only seemingly valid. The fact is the "bulk freight" either has to be shipped or it does not have to be shipped. If it does not, there will be no use running after it; if it does, then it will come of its own accord.

At this point the carrier is likely to interrupt, saying, "This is all nonsense, for we certainly would have no shiploads if we did not run after the freight, and run after it on the 'give-and-take' method."

And here the carrier is correct; it is all nonsense so far as conditions are to-day. But would not conditions be different under the proposed international commerce commission, under the proposed fixed rates? With no fixed rates the shrewd shipper of "bulk freight" knows well that at certain times the carrier is bound to tag after him. But with fixed rates for the season the shipper's game would be at an end. He would then always be glad enough to rush to the shipping office and "book" room for freight at the earliest moment possible; all of which would tend to promote the natural and steady flow of freight toward the ships.

THE DIVISION OF LABOR.

"But," says the objector, "would not this proposal to single out the ocean carrier by subjecting him to international control place him at a disadvantage? Would it not materially interfere with his earning power? Would it not reduce his profits?"

I do not think so. I think it can be shown that the adoption of the proposal would be advantageous not only to the producers and the consumers, but also to the carriers.

"How?"

Let us see. By the term "civilization" do we not really mean that cumulative state of progress rendered possible by the division of labor? The savage does everything by himself. He is his own carpenter, his own tailor, his own architect, his own carrier. But, as we know, such work is far inferior to that accomplished under the division of labor.

And this division of labor takes place not only in the handicrafts, but also in the field of commerce, in the field of government, and in the field of science. It is, in fact, but another term for "economies." In short, specialization of functions, division of labor, renders effort more effective and more economical. This being so, why not extend the system of the division of labor to the regulation and control of ocean carriage? If the specialization of functions, the division of labor, is beneficial, in what field can it be more profitably employed than in this important one of ocean carriage, a field which concerns not only the shipowners but the governments and the people everywhere?

Fortunately the channels through which the division of labor could be realized in the regulation and control of ocean carriage can readily be made available.

CHANNELS AVAILABLE FOR THE SERVICE.

First of all there could be the proposed international commerce commission, consisting of delegates who should be experts on the subject of ocean carriage. They should be in close official relationship with those departments and bureaus in the various governments which deal, directly and indirectly, with the questions of internal carriage in their relation to foreign carriage.

In the second place there is the International Institute of Agriculture, which could be officially authorized to place itself in communication in the several adhering countries with (a) the chambers of commerce and boards of trade, and with (b) the national agricultural organizations, all with the end in view of gathering information toward the synchronization of incoming and outgoing cargoes, said information to be compiled and regularly transmitted to the international commerce commission.

In the third place, a branch of The Hague Tribunal could be constituted and empowered to adjudicate on points of international law which might arise out of the commission's functions and decisions.

It is not difficult to see that all this, when once in operation, would be likely to bring about two important results.

THE PLAY OF FORCES.

First, by promoting the synchronization of incoming and outgoing cargoes it would tend to remove the uncertainties and perplexities which now beset the ocean carrier's business. In short, the focusing of information under the proposed system would make it possible to replace the present unfixed rates for the staples now abnormally low, now again abnormally high, by fixed average rates.

Second, such fixed average rates replacing the present uncertainties, violent fluctuations, and consequent losses would tend toward the more equitable formation of the world's price of the staples, and by steadying that equitable price would promote the economic interests of the people everywhere.

In other words, the adoption of the proposed system would set in motion a play of forces which, beginning in the township with the farmer and his product, working upward through the several channels indicated, thence through the international commerce commission, would tend to normalize the ebb and flow of the economic currents throughout the world of commerce and industry.

THE INTEREST OF THE PRODUCER.

And now we may expect the producer to intervene. "May not unfixed rates in reality mean low rates? Has it not been shown that under unfixed rates the carrier is often compelled to transport the staples as ballast free of any charge? Does not this system thus provide the lowest rate? And is it not likely that all this may profit the producer?"

Let us see. If the shipper were to give the producer his share of the difference between the price he actually received and the price he ought to have received whenever the staples were carried as ballast, then the above remarks might to some extent be justified. But how is the shipper, buying as he does in the wheat pit, to hunt up and identify the original owner of the product? And even if the shipper could hunt him up, what would induce him to give back part of his gains to the producer? Nothing that I know of. There is not even a remote chance that the producer will profit by the levy which the shipper raises on the carrier whenever he can compel him to carry freight free as ballast.

The producer's interests can not be served by abnormally low freight rates any more than by abnormally high freight rates; but they can be served by the fixed average rates which the adoption of the proposal here advocated would permit. Such fixed published rates would make it possible for the producer anywhere to arrive at a just approximation of what his home price ought to be in its relation to the world's price, and this would insure to him the best possible results.

But supposing some farmer, working, say, 160 acres of land, were to ask: "Of what value would the adoption of this proposal be to me, since I neither export my product nor sell it to exporters?"

The answer is a simple one; the home price is derived from the world's price, and the world's price is influenced by the cost of ocean carriage. Let the cost of ocean carriage fluctuate through unfixed rates, and it causes the world's price to fluctuate, which, in turn, causes fluctuation of the home price. Steadying the cost of ocean carriage steadies the world's price and steadies the home price of the staples, thus benefiting the farmer who neither exports nor sells to exporters as well as the farmers who export.

THE GOVERNMENTS.

Let us now inquire how the proposal for fixed rates under an international commerce commission would be received by the Governments.

It seems likely that it would be favored by the Governments of the exporting nations, the nations which have the staples of agriculture for sale. But how about the importing nations, the nations that are compelled to buy?

Had this question been asked some 25 years ago we might have expected the statesman of that day to have given some such answer as the following:

"We are not here as champions of altruism, nor for promoting doctrinaire theories as to equitable distribution. We know what we want. We want foodstuffs and raw materials at the very lowest price at which it may be possible for us to obtain them. The lower our influences can depress the world's price of the staples the better it is for us, the more abundant will be the food of our people and the cheaper will be the raw materials for our factories."

But, with the progress of our times, the statesman of to-day is likely to reason differently; he is likely to answer on this wise:

"We can not afford to force prices in the exporting countries below the normal. Our investments in those countries, the need we have of them as buyers of our manufactured goods, are sufficient inducements to warrant us in using our efforts to influence commerce in the staples along perfectly just and equitable lines, and this both at home and abroad."

THE STATESMAN.

But how will the case stand with those nations which possess a powerful merchant marine? Let us see what the statesman in such a country would have been likely to say some 25 years ago.

"We are not concerned with prices and their equities in foreign countries. In order to conserve and increase our national strength we are primarily concerned in the preservation and development of our merchant marine. We can not therefore afford to do anything that would be likely to hamper its freedom or subject its movements to international regulation."

But in our day the answer is likely to be different. The modern statesman is likely to reason:

"While a powerful merchant marine is essential to the well-being of a State, there is another consideration of far greater importance, and that is the well-being of all the people in that State, the well-being of its men, of its women, of its children. Our people must have work; they must eat and wear clothes and furnish their dwellings, and all of this is influenced by stability and equity in the price of the staples. Now, while the merchant marine may force prices in certain markets below their due level, it by no means follows that the products thus lowered will reach the consumers, the people of our State, at that low level. But it is certain that the deteriorating influences set going by the unfixed rates for ocean carriage, with the speculation they give rise to, will adversely affect not only the producer, but also the consumer."

There is yet another phase of the question which the statesman will, no doubt, bear in mind when considering the merchant marine, and that is the need of preserving the economic stability of the colonial possessions of the buying countries. The mother country may be a buyer of the staples; the colonies are almost always sellers. The lamb's gentle bleat will be likely to meet with a sympathetic response from its dam.

THE PROTECTIONIST.

But what will be the opinion of the statesman in a protection country which is neither an extensive exporter nor an importer of the staples?

Twenty-five years ago it is quite likely that such a statesman would have said:

"Yes; I see the wanton waste caused by design or fortuity in forcing the world's price to deflect from the line of the normal through the influences exercised by unfixed rates for the ocean carriage of the staples. It is a grievous injury to many, no doubt. But thanks to our system of protection, and thanks to our independence from the influences exercised by the exporting and importing markets, we are not affected by the evil trend thus imparted. Protection gives us our own special normal, our own price, independent of the world's price."

But the modern statesman is likely to reason:

"Protection is but another name for an artificial barrier. We have the artificial barrier, it is true, but for all that, and above and beyond it, the world's price rules here as it does in every other part of the world. We have the world's price, first of all, and on top of that the artificial enhancement which protection gives to our producers, and which comes out of the pockets of our consumers. It thus follows that we are fully as much interested in maintaining the world's price at its normal level as are the exporting or importing nations."

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION.

In summing up my argument in favor of the resolution, I wish to say that just as the regulation and control of the world's reports on the production of the staples required official international action, so the regulation and control of the terms and conditions for their ocean carriage also requires official international action.

Without such international action there can be no guaranty for equitable and fixed rates in the carriage of the staples. The absence of these equitable and fixed rates must necessarily give rise to disturbances throughout the economic world by forcing values to deflect from the line of the normal.

In concluding my arguments in favor of the adoption of the resolution, I wish to say that there seem to be three ways of disposing of the question before us. One would be to leave matters alone, to let the problems solve themselves. Another would be to live in the hope that the carriers may presently become so wise and disinterested that they will solve the question of their own accord and set matters right. But if in this matter, as in all others, adequate means are essential to the attainment of rational ends, we are forced to set aside both of these ways. This leaves the third way, that of action on the lines of the resolution submitted, the working out of the system indicated therein.

An impartial review of the subject must lead the statesman to the conclusion that this question can not be solved by action on empyrical lines. The problems of ocean carriage as they affect any one port, or all the ports of any one country, are, after all, but phases and fractions, portions of the question when it is considered as a whole. Viewed as a whole the problems transcend the limits of any one country; they are interrelated and concern all the countries of the world.

The time has passed when the statesman could dismiss this question with a wave of the hand. Population everywhere is increasing by leaps and bounds, and so is popular education. All this is equivalent to saying that wants are increasing. And it is clear that the highest aim of good statesmanship is to see that the demands arising out of these increased wants are not stupidly and unjustly frustrated by causes which have their root in inequities in the formation of the world's price of the staples.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the resolution for the moral effect it will have on the subject matter. I am in favor of it for the same reason that action by a great government has had on other problems in which other nations are interested. I realize that there is wide distinction between the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing rates and the almost impossibility of having an international commerce commission. But I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have been able in the transportation of boxed manufactured goods, which constitutes two-sevenths of our foreign merchandise, to fix the rate for 60 days upon transoceanic shipment. I want to put the proposition up to these gentlemen here why we can not fix the rates on the other five-sevenths. A man that manufactures shoes in Boston and sells them in Liverpool or London or in Brussels has the rate fixed for 60 days at which he may ship the shoes. Why can not the men that export wheat and cotton have the rate fixed in some way?

Of course, I understand that there are many economical features entering into the shipment of agricultural products—the amount produced in other countries, the distance exported for shipment, the avenue through which the shipment is to be made; but no man has assigned a reason in this discussion why you can not fix the rate on agricultural products as you can on manufactured products. Another feature of the proposition is that the farmer is not concerned about the extremely low rates or the ordinary rate that the gentleman from Illinois speaks about.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. No; I can not, I have not the time. I want to call attention to the fact that it is not the farmer who gets the low rate. It is the elevator man and the shipper and not the farmer who get the low rate. There can be no doubt but that the International Institute of Agriculture has greatly widened the field of information for all the nations that adhere to it, consisting of 56 in this international agreement. It has widened the field of information by publishing the amount of agricultural products weekly, the demand for them in the different sections of the country, and giving information upon which our own people are interested.

I recognize another feature, and that is to establish effectually a standardization of rates we must have an agreement of some kind between the great shippers of this country and the people to whom the grain is shipped. I recognize that transcontinental freight rates are largely fixed and controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Competition gradually determined closely what the rate should be. When you induct into the problem transoceanic commerce you come in contact with economic conditions that affect not only ourselves but our customers abroad. The adoption of this resolution can not do us any harm. This Congress should show that its purpose is to regulate, if it can be done, ocean freight rates, as far as possible, for the products of the farm that constitute one-half of our export trade.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired and all time has expired.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 2, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, from the Committee on Labor, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 604) requesting the Secretary of Labor to transmit to the House of Representatives information concerning public aid for home owning and housing of working people in foreign countries, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1122), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which was referred the bill (S. 6039) for the coinage of certain gold and silver coins in commemoration of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1126), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOGUE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9584) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the present old post office and the site thereof in the city of Jersey City, N. J., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1127), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 598) directing report made by Maj. Eli A. Helmick to the War Department relative to the purchase of supplies be furnished the House of Representatives, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 1123), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 543) to correct the military record of John T. Haines, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1125), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18587) granting a pension to Mary Shields, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 18629) for the establishment of a land-bond bureau in the United States Treasury, the establishment of a farm-loan bureau in the Department of Agriculture, and to reduce the rate of interest on farm loans; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 18630) to make it unlawful to ship in commerce between the States any grain or seed for the purposes of sale or barter for use in agriculture which are falsely labeled or branded, or falsely represented, and to fix a penalty for the violation of this act; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 18631) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Bayonne, N. J.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HOBSON: A bill (H. R. 18632) to encourage the development of the American merchant marine and to promote commerce and the national defense; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. GLASS: A bill (H. R. 18633) to amend section 1 of the act of May 30, 1908, relating to emergency currency; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 331) relating to the awards and payments thereon in what are commonly known as the Plaza cases; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HULL: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 332) to enable the Department of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Soils and any other bureau, to locate and report the soil areas in Southern States that are adapted to the successful production of cattle and hogs; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. EDMONDS: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 333) authorizing the President to temporarily suspend the dealings in futures of foodstuffs; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAIR: A bill (H. R. 18634) granting an increase of pension to William W. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 18635) for the relief of the estate of Henry McCarty, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DUPRÉ: A bill (H. R. 18636) for the relief of Anaise F. Zeringue and the estate of Mathilde C. Zeringue; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GUDGER: A bill (H. R. 18637) granting a pension to Joseph H. Bryson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KEATING: A bill (H. R. 18638) granting an increase of pension to John M. Morgan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18639) for the relief of John Burk; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NEELEY of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 18640) granting a pension to George W. Norris; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 18641) granting an increase of pension to Ezra A. Bristol; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE: A bill (H. R. 18642) granting an increase of pension to Clark C. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. AUSTIN: Petition of L. C. French, Ruth Craft, and others, of Knoxville, Tenn., urging Federal legislation for woman suffrage; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BAILEY: Petition of J. Blumenthal's Sons, of Altoona, Pa., protesting against any additional tax on tobacco; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BELL of California: Petition of the Knights of the Maccabees of the World, of Pomona, Cal., favoring the Hamill civil-service retirement bill; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. BRUCKNER: Petition of the Central Federated Union, favoring the passage of the seamen's bill; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. DERSHEM: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Milroy, Pa., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. DONOVAN: Petition of the Connecticut State Medical Society, relative to mental examination of arriving immigrants; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the Connecticut Leaf Tobacco Association, against increased taxes on cigars; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of Ward 19 Democratic Club, of Boston, Mass., protesting against manipulation in prices of foodstuffs and the exportation of same to foreign countries; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HAMILL: Memorial of the Socialist Party of Hudson County, N. J., relative to prohibition of the exportation of foodstuffs, etc., for use during European war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of East Hartford, Conn., favoring the passage of the Hobson-Sheppard bill for national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of the executive committee of the Connecticut Deeper Waterways Association, of New Haven, Conn., favoring the passage of the pending rivers and harbors bill; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Petitions of various business men of Elk Creek, Nemaha, and Verdon, all in the State of Nebraska, favoring passage of House bill 5308, relative to taxing mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: Protest of the San Francisco Retail Cigar Dealers' Association, against any increase in the revenue tax on cigars and tobacco products; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the San Francisco Labor Council, protesting against the passage of the Hobson nation-wide prohibition resolution; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, resolutions of the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco, Cal., favoring the passage of House bill 5139, providing pensions for superannuated civil-service employees; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: Memorial of the Connecticut Deeper Waterways Association, favoring the passage of the rivers and harbors bill; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, memorial of Guilford Grange, No. 81, Patrons of Husbandry, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. STEVENS of California: Petition of C. A. Cary and 20 other citizens of Los Angeles County, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, individual petitions of Martha Harries and 120 other citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, letters from the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal., against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, letters from the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal., against Government printing on envelopes; to the Committee on Printing.

Also, telegram from various retail cigar dealers of San Francisco, protesting against increased revenue tax on cigars and tobacco; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petitions of sundry citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. WATSON: Petitions of sundry citizens of Prince George County, Va., asking for an investigation of the Milliken bill in regard to the establishment of a personal rural credit system; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, petition of sundry citizens of Prince Edward County, Va., asking for investigation of bill relative to a personal rural credit system; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: Petitions of 25 members of the Empire State Club of Chicago, Ill., relative to House joint resolution 282, for due credit to Dr. F. A. Cook for his polar efforts; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.
